Unconsciously, we accept the ideas transmitted to us through the medium of television. Seldom does anyone stop and ask why we are willing to watch such inhumane acts.

VIOLENCE IS so common to our lives that when acts of terrorism occur, we tend to treat them as we would a TV show and ask, "Who will win?"

The problem here is that actual acts of terrorism are no longer random occurrences. Any person who can obtain a weapon can walk into wherever you may be at the time and hold you a hostage. Unless a method is discovered for curbing such violent acts, we may all come face to face with a terrorist wielding a shotgun.

Unfortunately, acts of terrorism constitute newsworthy events and are widely publicized. The media have the responsibility to report the news, no matter how gruesome or horrifying.

THE BOTTOM line rests with the individual's sense of moral outrage. While watching these kinds of events we need to remember that we may someday be involved.

Terrorists are not unlike the television actors we faithfully watch performing violent acts of "heroism." The time has come for us to separate fiction from fact.

We can no longer afford to glorify violence. It must be eliminated from the realm of "entertainment," and placed in its proper role as the most disgusting disease to inhabit the mind of man.

Summer school isn't all bad

Have you recently noticed that several people seem incredulous when you tell them you are spending your summer going to school? They all seem to ask that inevitable question: WHY?

Are you at a loss for reasons? Do you stammer around and say, "because..."

Then this column is for you. It will give you 10 good answers for turning away those annoying inquisitors.

Tell them there are several advantages of going to summer school. When they ask what those advantages are, you can start out with these few ideas and add some of your own.

Summer school classes are smaller, more informal, more intimate—you actually have a chance of meeting the people in your classes.

It's a good way to pick up a few extra hours to either renew your teaching certificate, or move up on the pay scale at your regular job.

It's a good way to get those horrible required classes out of the way.

It can be a crash course on learning how to finish your assignments on time. You no longer have a whole 16 weeks to procrastinate over that term paper.

If you're a freshman, it's a good way to acquaint yourself with facts and fallacies of college life.

It's also a way to get through school faster, and out into the "real world" before all your classmates are vying for the job you want.

Thanks to the hot summer weather, the physical plant is nice about turning on the air conditioners in all the buildings that have air conditioners. In fact, they are so nice sometimes, you need a jacket to keep from freezing.

You will notice there are fewer people on campus during the summer. This will mean more room on the sidewalks, which in turn means less chance of getting run over by those brave and daring cyclists.

If you sublease an apartment summer provides an excellent opportunity to learn all sorts of things about yourself, and especially how to get along with crusty landlords.

What better way to spend eight extra weeks away from home, preferably at your parents' expense?

If all else fails, and none of these reasons seem to fit your situation, you can always answer your inquisitive friend with the inevitable: "Why not?"

Court declares death sentence not automatic in police murders

WASHINGTON (AP)—States may not automatically sentence to death all persons convicted of killing police officers, the Supreme Court said in a sharply divided ruling Monday.

By a 5-4 vote, the justices threw out as unconstitutional a Louisiana law that made death in the electric chair a mandatory penalty for murderers of police.

Many states had similar laws before 1976, but only New York and Louisiana had such statutes currently on their books. Monday's ruling presumably invalidated New York's law as well.

MANY STATES were expected to draft mandatory death

Shooting incident prompts inquiries

A Prairie Village man who was shot early Sunday morning is in satisfactory condition at St. Mary Hospital.

William Moss, 25, was shot in the back with a rifle, according to police, who were notified of the shooting by officials from St. Mary's Sunday morning.

A Riley County Police Department official said there are still several unanswered questions in the shooting incident. There were five witnesses to the shooting, but police say all five have "varying stories."

Moss told police the shooting was an accident, but the name of the person who shot the gun could not be released because police aren't sure yet whether any charges will be made in connection with the shooting.

penalties if the court had ruled they were constitutional.

California, now without a valid death penalty law, had urged the court to approve Louisiana's law.

A spokesman for the NAACP's Legal Defense Fund, which opposes capital punishment, said only three Death Row inmates were affected by the court's ruling.

In an unsigned opinion, the court's majority said, "It is essential that the capital sentencing decision allow for consideration of whatever mitigating circumstances may be relevant to the particular offender or the particular offense."

"Because the Louisiana statute does not allow consideration of particularized mitigating factors, it is unconstitutional," the opinion said.

JUSTICES William Brennan Jr., Thurgood Marshall, Potter Stewart, Louis Powell Jr., and John Stevens joined in the decision.

Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justices William Rehnquist, Harry Blackmun and Bryon White voted to uphold Louisiana's law.

Rehnquist, in dissent, said, "The argument weighing in favor of society's determination to impose a mandatory sentence for the murder of a police officer in the line of duty are far stronger than in the case of an ordinary homicide."

Calling police officers "the foot soldiers of society's defense of ordered liberty," Rehnquist said Louisiana has an interest "in making unmistakably clear that those who are convicted of deliberately killing police officers

... be forewarned that punishment in the form of death will be inexorable."

REHNQUIST AND White said they were "appalled" by the majority's statement.

ISC aids cultural sharing

By LISA CARMICHAEL
Staff Writer

A cultural bridge will lead students to the new International Student Center (ISC). Those involved hope ISC will lead to a better understanding between American and foreign students.

"We hope it (ISC) will be something to involve both American and foreign students. It is for everyone," said Allen Brettell, foreign student adviser.

The ISC will open in the fall. The center will house the foreign student office and facilities for relaxation and intercultural sharing.

Now housed in Fairchild Hall, the office handles students' problems, both personal and administrative.

"We have to move a lot of paper. There's a lot of red tape to handle and we still stay free to advise and counsel," Brettell said.

ADMINISTRATIVE DUTIES include signing necessary papers for students so they can visit their native countries and return to the United States to finish their studies.

Visas must be renewed each year. Anytime a foreign student wants to work or travel out of the country, documents must be completed.

The ISC will also offer a place to relax, study and socialize. There is a small kitchen in which the students will be able to make their native foods and share them.

A lounge with study facilities and a multi-purpose room also will be available. Three clocks showing the time in three different parts of the world will be in the front lobby.

"We hope to change the countries every year. Right now it is set up to show the time in London, Tokyo and Manhattan," Brettell said.

BRETTELL IS optimistic about the new center.

"It really adds to the campus. No trees were torn out for the building and, when the landscaping is finished, it will definitely complement the surroundings," he said. "We hope it will attract all students."

The ISC has been built entirely by private funds. Edward J. King Jr., a K-State alumnus, donated $250,000, and SGA appropriated $20,000 to be used for the temporary furnishings.

Weed harvest booms

GALENA, KS. (AP) - Weeds are big business to John Link.

He collects weeds—property owners sometimes even pay him for removing them—and sells them to dealers in decorative materials.

Link, 42, started in the business when he was 14. He used his income from selling weeds to finance his education, which led to a degree and a 10-year teaching career in Joplin, Mo.

DURING THE time he was concentrating on education he also continued his unusual occupation of collecting and selling cattails, bittersweet, acorns, lotus pods and other weeds.

His first sale was in St. Louis where a dealer bought about 50 pieces of weed from him for $7.50. It wasn't enough to pay for his trip to St. Louis, but it got him started.

"I must have driven a million miles," he said. "I traveled all over the country selling and making deals. Before long most of the dealers in decorative materials knew me and it was just built up from there."

Escaped prisoner caught at Jardine

An escaped prisoner from the state penitentiary at Lansing was recaptured Sunday night in Manhattan by both K-State Security and Traffic and Riley County Police.

Paul Shannon, 25, was apprehended at 8 p.m. Sunday near Jardine Terrace when officers from both police forces recognized him as the escaped prisoner from Lansing.

Shannon, from Manhattan, was serving a two-to-ten year sentence for burglary. A spokesman from Lansing said Shannon had violated parole once after being released from prison on a previous burglary conviction. The current sentence resulted from a second burglary conviction.

He was taken back to Lansing by prison officials early Monday morning.

Decision may hurt Ethics Commission

TOPEKA (AP)—A legislative ethics committee voted Monday to abolish some record keeping requirements which have served as important tools in enforcement of the Campaign Finance Act.

Lynn Hellebust, executive secretary of the Governmental Ethics Commission, warned lawmakers that the action could virtually eliminate the commission's ability to enforce the act.

The special interim committee on elections voted, 5-3, to eliminate the requirements that county treasurers make a photocopy of each contribution over $25 or have the same information available from a bank's microfilm records.

IN ADDITION, the committee struck language in the current regulations which permits the commission access to a bank's records to audit the contributions and expenditures of any candidate.

Earlier in the day, Kathleen Sebelius, a spokesman for Common Cause, asked that the requirements remain so the ethics commission can accurately investigate campaign complaints.

In addition, she urged lawmakers to make it illegal for politicians in Kansas to accept anonymous contributions or each contribution over $25.

MRS. SEBELIUS, a former member of the ethics commission, said the weakest area of the state law deals with lobbying.

Answer to yesterday's puzzle.

Finley says Kuhn lied on stand; is planning to file a second suit

CHICAGO (AP)—Charles Finley, who said, "You could have knocked me over with a feather" when he lost his suit against baseball Commissioner Bowie Kuhn, said Monday he is planning another suit against Kuhn.

"A second lawsuit will be filed against Kuhn as soon as we complete filing our briefs and appeal," Finley, owner of the Oakland A's, told the Associated Press Sports Editors Association convention.

"And I'd like to see Kuhn wiggle out of that one like he did when he got on the witness stand and lied, not once but several times," said Finley, whose original suit contended that Kuhn did not have the power to negate his sales of Joe Rudi and Rollie Fingers to the Boston Red Sox and Vida Blue to the New York Yankees.

Finley refused to elaborate on the purpose of the suit.

Fund-raising fails; yacht will be sold

NEW YORK (AP)—Lack of funds will keep the 12-meter yacht Intrepid, two-time defender of the America's Cup, from joining her stablemate, Enterprise, in Newport, R.I., for the 23rd defense.

"The time we had for fund-raising just wasn't enough," said Edward du Moulin, manager of the Maritime College at Fort Schuyler Foundation, Inc., which owns both yachts.

He said Intrepid, currently in San Diego, will be sold through sealed bids.

Sports

CLAIMING BASEBALL is in "bad, bad shape," Finley said drastic action must be taken. "If not, you'll see the major leagues reduced from 26 teams to 22 or even 20 teams. That's how bad the situation is.

"The handwriting is on the wall," said Finley. "The day of reckoning is here. We've seen the World Football League go under, we've seen some of the World Hockey Association teams go under and maybe some more and we've seen the American Basketball Association go out of business." Finley also admitted he made a mistake when he moved his A's from Kansas City to Oakland.

"I MADE a mistake when I went to Oakland," said Finley. "I didn't know what I know now. Two teams cannot survive in the Bay Area. I don't think there will be two teams there in 1978. I would like to be the team left there.

Senate could hold secret meetings

BY KAY COLES
Editor

Since Kansas Attorney General Curt Schneider ruled that Student Senate is not covered by the state's opening meetings law, it is conceivable Senate could hold all its meetings in secret.

"The Attorney General is saying (by his ruling) they aren't covered by the open meetings law," said University Attorney Richard Seaton. "It would appear they can do anything."

Although the power has been given Senate to close their meetings, Cindy Thomas, Senate Chairman, does not believe Senate will make use of the power.

"I personally am against having closed meetings," she said. "The only thing closed will be secret ballots."

THE SECRET ballot issue was raised last spring when Senate elected its chairman by secret ballot. It was the election which prompted the request for a ruling by Schneider regarding the applicability of the open meetings law to Senate.

The ballots are cast in secret, according to Thomas, because people feel more comfortable about voting.

Sometimes if you have two friends running for an office, there can be bad feelings if the votes are cast in the open, Thomas said.

"In a way it does exclude students," she said. "But it's the election of our officers."

"A parallel can be drawn that the students elect the Student Body President by secret ballot and we elect our officers by secret ballot," she said.

THOMAS SAID she felt it would be detrimental for Senate to close its meetings.

"We, Terry (Matlack) and I, want to improve communications with the students. If we close the meetings we would be cutting our own throats," she said.

According to Senate's constitution, their authority comes from a mandate by the student body, Thomas said.

"I think legislation which affects the students, they have a right to know about," she said.

Finance Committee, the group in charge of budget considerations, will probably not open its meetings.

"Finance Committee may use the ruling in the future (to close their meetings)," Thomas said. "They keep allocations closed to stop lobbying."

IN ORDER to provide a fair budget hearing for organizations requesting funds, Finance Committee tries to "keep things running smoothly" Thomas said, by keeping people out.

"They don't want someone coming in and trying to take over the meetings," she said.

Thomas said it was important for the present Senate to keep the meetings open.

"If we keep our meetings open," she said, "It will become tradition to have open meetings."

Manhattan help centers provide guidance counseling, job service

Helping out one's fellow man isn't just a cliché in Manhattan. Three centers exist which provide a variety of services for the community.

They are the Big Lakes Developmental Center, the North Central Kansas Guidance Center and Manhattan Youth Care, Inc.,

Big Lakes Developmental Center (BLDC) is based on "the right to human dignity and freedom for every person," said Calvin Johnson, center supervisor.

Divided into two sections, the center offers programs for children under age six and other services for persons over 16 years.

Johnson explained Big Lakes helps lead people to self-sufficiency and jobs, even if they are handicapped.

"That is our goal," he said. "Every person deserves the right to dignified work, even if he happens to have a disability."

"Companies like McCall's (Pattern Company) bring jobs here to the people and each worker is paid wages for work he completes," he said. McCall's brings in patterns and tissue which Big Lakes' clients recycle.

EACH WORKER coming to the center is first evaluated as to his limitations, abilities and preferences. Adjustment to work depends on the functioning level of each person.

The person is then either placed in the work activities program or the work program. The work activities program is for those with low functioning levels. The work program is designed for those capable of job placement.

BLDC's placement director assigns jobs and a federal grant pays 80 per cent of wages for a three-month period. After that, the hiring company decides if it wants to retain the worker.

The center, which serves four counties, helps the mentally retarded and the physically handicapped obtain self-sufficiency.

"The dignity of employment helps to make each individual aware of his own capabilities and teaches responsibility," Johnson said.

THE NORTH Central Kansas Guidance Center (NCKGC) offers a wide variety of services, including individual counseling, psychotherapy, marital counseling, divorce counseling, children's play therapy and provides emotional health and alcoholism-drug information.

"The center is used a lot," Mary Hinman of NCKGC, said. "We use a sliding fee system adjusted individually according to a client's income level and ability to pay."

Ability to pay is based on number of dependents, marital status, socio-economic level and property.

"We do have several students who come in to use our services," Hinman said, "but not as many as from the Manhattan community."

"Students usually use the Mental Health Services at Lafene Student Health Center."

According to Hinman, a person desiring to use the center's services must first call in and make an appointment. The therapist he sees on his first visit decides in which area the client needs help.

MANHATTAN YOUTH CARE, Inc., (MYC) is a community-based home for pre-delinquent and delinquent boys.

Some are sent to MYC by the Riley County probation officer and others are sent upon recommendation by Social Rehabilitation Services.

"We teach the kids coping skills and set up a program for each child," said Mike Lineburgh, trainee at MYC. "The two areas of treatment used are behavior modification and the contract system."

In behavior modification, behaviors that can condition a child and be reinforced with rewards are taught. This includes positive reinforcement with kisses and hugs, something the children may have lacked in their home lives, Lineburgh said.

THE CONTRACT system involves the child and a houseparent sitting down and designing a contract which states different qualities and characteristics that need to be worked on.

Carter's opposition to bomber wanes

WASHINGTON (AP)— President Carter's spokesman said Tuesday the commander-in-chief could be convinced to retreat from his opposition to the B1 bomber.

White House Press Secretary Jody Powell said the President was "open to arguments there is some merit" in the advanced bomber.

His comments followed Sen. Barry Goldwater's statement after a meeting with the President that Carter "is becoming convinced we can't live without the B1."

Carter left little doubt during the Presidential campaign last year that he openly opposed development of the nearly $100 million bomber, saying it was wasteful and should not be funded.

BUT POWELL, asked whether Goldwater was wrong when he indicated Carter may be coming around to the thinking of the airplane's advocates said "I don't know. I can't guess where he's leaning."

Carter told Goldwater and eight other House and Senate backers of the B1 that he would make a "basic judgment" about proceeding with further B1 work by the end of June.

The President met with the pro-B1 group for nearly an hour. He planned a similar meeting Friday with the bomber's congressional opponents.

"I'm eager to learn all I can about this before I make my own decision," said Carter, listing his choices as full-scale production, termination of the project and "several options in between."

WHILE CARTER met with the airplane's advocates, environmentalists argued in federal court that production of the fleet should be prohibited until the Pentagon adequately examined its environmental impact. No court decision was made.

The Air Force wants to develop a fleet of 244 B1s. The cost for each has been estimated to be $92.5 million.

The government contract with Rockwell International for work on the airplane expired Dec. 1, but it was continued at $87 million a month until Carter could make a decision on the bomber's future.

"The President is going to have to commit himself to some B1s," declared Goldwater, an Arizona Republican who is a retired major general in the Air Force reserve.

Asked if B1 production would depend on whether the Soviet Union agrees to American proposals for strategic arms limitations, Goldwater said, "No. If I understood the President, the Russians could not care less what we do with the B1...He, Carter didn't elaborate."

Amin up in air over cool Commonwealth reception

BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
Uganda's President Idi Amin was reported flying somewhere over Europe in a borrowed military plane Tuesday in a bizarre attempt to attend the Commonwealth summit in London.

The Irish Government declared it would not let him land, while sources in Brussels said the Belgian government also would reject him, and Britain made clear he was officially unwelcome. But France said there was nothing to prevent Amin from making a private visit.

AIRPORT POLICE in Lille, France, reported sighting a wide-bodied aircraft accompanied by several fighter planes of unknown nationality flying over Calais in the direction of Belgium. But authorities declined to speculate whether it might be Amin.

Eurocontrol, the central air control authority in Western Europe, said the Ugandan leader's plane never filed a flight plan.

Amin's mystery flight followed months of debate over whether he would attend the Commonwealth summit. British and other Commonwealth leaders made clear the brash, burly Ugandan was unwelcome because of the mass murders and atrocities he, his army and police have allegedly inflicted on their East African nation.

traffic authorities Tuesday morning. Hours later, the Irish government announced it had been alerted that Amin was approaching Dublin airport and it quickly ordered that he not be allowed to land except in an emergency.

But Irish officials said they made neither radio nor radar contact with the plane, and it was subsequently believed headed back toward the European mainland.

BRITISH Prime Minister James Callaghan recently sent Amin a letter telling him his presence at the summit would be "inappropriate" and the Foreign Office said unspecified contingency plans had been drawn up in case he did come.

The opposition hardened over the weekend when the Ugandan health minister, Henry Kyemba, defected to London and in a newspaper interview said estimates that Amin had killed at least 100,000 persons since he seized power in 1971 were probably correct.

MIAMI (AP) —A controversial law prohibiting discrimination against homosexuals in housing and employment was repealed in a special Dade County election Tuesday.

"Anita Bryant danced a jig," when she learned the election results, said Mike Thompson, a spokesman for Save Our Children, which fought the law.

"I'm here to spread the word that Dade County has been a loving community before and I hope it will be a loving community tomorrow," said Ruth Shack, the county commissioner who sponsored the law. "I'm worried about emotional violence and physical violence."

"We'll continue from here."

KANSAS CITY (AP) — School officials said Tuesday they have not been advised about the acceptability of their school desegregation plan, which the New York Times says will be rejected.

A report by the Times Tuesday said officials in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare intend to reject the plan of the Kansas City School District because it fails to meet a new and more liberal interpretation of what is required under federal law to achieve desegregation.

The newspaper reported that the government plans to tell the district it must revise its desegregation plan to use pairing and clustering rather than the one it submitted in March that would allow about 30 schools to remain virtually all black.

CHICAGO (AP) —Democrat Michael Bilandic easily defeated Republican Dennis Block to win a special election Tuesday for mayor of Chicago succeeding the late Richard Daley.

Although turnout at the close of a boring campaign seemed likely to be the lightest in 50 years, the figures showed that the Democratic machine remained in firm control of Chicago politics.

Bilandic, 54, a longtime Daley friend and aide, will complete the remaining two years in Daley's sixth term.

Bilandic, acting mayor since Daley's death on Dec. 20, had the support of Daley's family and the party machine that Daley built.

WASHINGTON (AP) — The House passed a bill Tuesday to allow the nation's 2.8 million federal employees to engage in partisan politics, including running for office.

The bill, approved 244 to 164, now goes to the Senate, where it is expected to have a tougher time.

The bill would free federal workers to run for office for the first time since the Hatch Act was enacted in 1939 in an attempt to end political arm-twisting of federal workers by their bosses.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA. (AP) — There's a group of sparrows here that keep going around in circles. Their home is in the bottom of a revolving sign.

There's a small hole in the hollow sign and the sparrows must time their entry with the revolutions of the sign. They do this by perching atop a nearby street light post, eyeballing the turning sign and taking off just as it starts its turn toward the service station.

The only problem, according to Paul Contorno, the station owner, is that when the baby birds come out, "they fly in circles, because that's all they've been doing inside the sign."

Reality therapy, another technique, is done in a counseling setting with the establishment of a trust relationship between child and counselor. The children are given alternatives, advice and the consequences of alternatives.

"When you see a child for the first time at age 17, there is so much scar tissue," Lineburgh said. "Their time spent in the home will be longer than most of the boys. The usual length of time is a minimum of six months, sometimes lasting two years."

"The home has a 74 per cent success rate, which means that after leaving our program, the boy doesn't wind up in a criminal institution," he said.

AT THE TOPEKA Boys Industrial Center, the return rate of past clients is 75 per cent, just the opposite of MYC, Lineburgh said.

"We try to set a loving and consistent environment for the children because there are too many kids still living in bad home environments," he said.

"Our problem is that we live in a Darwinistic society where only the fittest survive. The question often asked is, 'Why help or support a youth home?'"

"Getting people to understand that they (the children) are our responsibility is one of MYC's goals," he said.

Closed meetings: dangerous future

Kansas Attorney General Curt Schneider may think Student Senate does not have "real" legislative power in the state and following the letter of the law, it may not.

But, the University has only once vetoed a Senate action, making the power of Student Senate little recognized by the majority of the student body, but widely felt by all when it comes time to pay the activity fee.

THE ALLOCATION of funds to the different social service organizations on campus is probably Senate's biggest responsibility. In one way or another, all students partake of the services offered.

It is this power which makes Schneider's ruling about the open meeting law a fearful one.

Senate now has the right to close all its meetings, including the tentative and final allocations meetings, to the public and press.

WITH CLOSED meetings, the students would be completely left out of the process which decides how their monies will be spent.

Cindy Thomas, Senate Chairman, doubts this will happen. If she, and other responsible persons like her, have their say, students will be able to continue their participation in the funding process.

But, Schneider's ruling has set a dangerous precedent for the closing of meetings to the student body.

SENATE WILL have to be careful and see to it that future Senators are as willing to be responsible to their electorate.

If we should happen to obtain a majority of obstinate, irresponsible Senators, we could be eliminated from the decision making process which Senate could then claim as exclusively theirs.

Yes, there are a lot of "ifs" in this reasoning, but we must all actively protect what rights we have lest we be stripped of them all.

Korean pullout not harmful

It's hard to believe Maj. General John Singlaub's statement that the announced pullout of U.S. troops and nuclear devices from South Korea will result in another Korean war.

Singlaub, moving into his comfortable but harmless new job in Georgia, maintains his apprehensions about the future of South Korea, but the number of those in Washington who agree with him is shrinking — and for good reason. He is underestimating both the strength of the South Koreans and the intelligence of the North Koreans.

Singlaub's main argument is that a pullout of American ground forces from South Korea will be followed by a surge of North Koreans across the Demilitarized Zone and that they will have the hearty support of either China or the Soviet Union.

THE ABSURD parallel is drawn, then between 1977 Korea and the defenseless Korea of 1950. The situations are not similar.

In 1977, South Korea is tied to the U.S. by a mutual defense treaty which assures American aid if North Korea wanders across the DMZ.

Also, South Korea is far from defenseless. Today's South Korea is militarily and economically stronger than North Korea.

What they won't have, of course, is U.S. ground troops and American-made nuclear devices which will follow the troops out of Korea.

SINGLAUB'S BELIEF that the South Koreans can't defend themselves against what he called a "massive buildup of military might" in North Korea is a sad comment on our presence there. If, after 25 years of military and technical training of South Korean forces, and with their supply of American military hardware, South Korea can't defend itself against the North, the presence of American troops at all in Korea should be questioned.

Whether they could or not, is it even remotely possible they would have to? Would North Korea even entertain the idea of invading the South?

It's unlikely.

MILITARY BUILDUP is not a sure sign of impending invasion. If it were, I shudder to think of the paranoia which must be rampant among our neighbors, Canada and Mexico. Arms buildup is very much in vogue and if Singlaub is using that to base his prophecy of certain invasion on, he should wake up and look at the rest of the world.

North Korea wouldn't launch a successful attack without the support of either China or the Soviet Union and it's improbable either country would dispose of detente and relations with the U.S. for the benefit of a country with only 15 million people, especially when neither would realize any tangible benefits.

War in Korea is unlikely, and the need for 42,000 American servicemen in South Korea no longer exists. Having troops in another country for training purposes is one thing, but having them there for 25 years as a precautionary measure is quite another.

'For a good time, call...'

Most students think of buildings such as Eisenhower and Justin Halls as places of learning and the home of tests, lectures and occasional naps.

I, too, regard the campus buildings in this fashion, but I also look at them in another light. That is, a good place to get a laugh, if not from the teacher, then from the graffiti on the bathroom walls.

Take Thompson Hall, for example. This building houses the geography and geology departments and one of its bathroom walls has this inscription on it, "Geology majors have their faults." After reading that, I giggled all the way to World Regional Geography and didn't stop giggling until we had covered the Third World.

THOMPSON HALL is also the owner of this dandy, "Do not throw your cigarette butts in the urinal. It makes them soggy and hard to light." Someone else, in different ink, wrote below it, "Yeah? Who wants soggy, hard to light urinals?"

Call Hall proudly displays pictures of its past meat judging teams on its walls. But you need not look at these pictures to determine the purpose of this building. Just go to the bathroom. I mean, read the bathroom walls.

These two boasts were scribbled on one wall, "Green River Valley Beef, Wyoming's Best," and "Kansas Meat the Best."

I was confused as to who actually raised the best meat and decided perhaps we should have a national beef competition with all states entered to determine who raises the best meat. We can call it the "United States Meat Meet," and the rules will state that a team can only protest an official's decision when it has a legitimate beef. Enough.

Also, Call Hall owns, "Beef Eaters are Better Lovers." Being a meat and potatoes man, I can hardly dispute this claim.

ANDERSON HALL is a disappointment. The bathroom walls are pristine. There is absolutely no graffiti to be read. I may never use Anderson Hall's bathrooms again.

The Union is the home of this gem, "In case of a tornado, jump in the stool; it ain't been hit yet." Now I know why the Union is a fall-out shelter.

It used to be fun to go in the bathroom in Farrell Library because the walls had so much to say. Lines such as "McGovern can't lick our Dick," and "Don't eat yellow snow," always brought out the best in me. Unfortunately, the walls have been painted and it's no fun going in there anymore.

Other buildings feature graffiti on their walls such as Seaton's "Make it with an architect," Kedzie's "To hell with liberal journalists," and Cardwell's "Eat beans, America-needs the gas." Even the home of the football team, KSU stadium, has "Slippery Rock, Number 1." The nerve of it.

AND, of course, there are the usual, "If you want a good time, call..." with a woman's name and phone number following. I was particularly baffled however, the line which, located in the men's room, read "If you want a good time, call Bruno in 419 Marlatt." I guess I'll never know. No one answered.

But I especially got a big laugh out of this last example found in an off-campus building, "If the Lord were going to give the world an enema, he'd put the hose in Abilene."

Movie depicts Rhodesian massacre of U.N. refugee site in Mozambique

By VELINA HOUSTON
News Editor

On Aug. 8, 1976, white Rhodesian armed forces attacked Nyazonia, a refugee camp 25 miles within the border of Mozambique.

The attack on the United Nations camp of 8,000 left 618 civilian men, women and children dead. The 8,000 were part of 26,000 refugees who fled Rhodesia during the previous year.

Nyazonia, like many other attacked camps, is not a military base. Rhodesian attacks on refugees are not uncommon in Mozambique. They date back to the 1960s, with similar attacks occurring just last week.

The Nyazonia attack was documented and the film, "Massacre at Nyazonia," is being presented by the K-State Black Student Union and the Anti-Imperialist Solidarity Committee, an ad hoc group concerned with the "oppressive nature of white Rhodesian presence in southern Africa," according to Tim Cross, spokesman.

THE 45-MINUTE film captures human weakness and tragedy at their worst—the psychological nausea of guerrilla warfare and the tragedy of innocent lives destroyed.

The actual adversaries are the guerrilla forces and the Rhodesian government, but the sufferers are the refugees, their way of life thwarted and uprooted by Rhodesian forces.

The scene of buildings and vehicles in ashes and thin children scurrying around in rags are gut-wrenching. The Mozambicans are reduced to lowly animals, surviving on less than what Americans feed their cats and dogs. Their diet consisted of a starchy, white paste meal, sometimes infested with insects but still readily consumed. Even in this level of existence, they were forced to go lower.

After the attack, Nyazonia was piled high with dead bodies. Misshapen clothes, shattered bullets, shoes lost in attempted flights—they lay scattered among the ruins.

THE RHODESIANS blew up bridges, vehicles, homes...and people. One survivor said they had no defense at all. "Shoot with what?" he asked incredulously. Hundreds of bodies were thrown into deep trenches and buried.

Audience discussion after the film bore some interesting opinions.

"What happens in guerrilla warfare is whatever forces the guerrillas are fighting against take out on the innocents," one man said. In this case, since the Rhodesians could not get at the guerrillas, they attacked Mozambique. In essence the government has declared war against the people by declaring it against the guerrilla forces.

"An act like Nyazonia on the part of white Rhodesia is an act of desperation," Cress said.

THE FILM attempts to arouse sympathy in Americans and expresses the psychological warfare between Rhodesia and the guerrilla movement. The opposing forces declare war against the general population.

The film psychologically conditions its audience. You will find yourself saying, "How can I help these people? What can I do?" The mass killings and the conditions under which the refugees were living knot your stomach. "Massacre at Nyazonia" will be shown today at 7 p.m. in Union 212. Admission is free.

British patriotic fervor erupts for Elizabeth's silver jubilee

LONDON (AP)—With an eruption of patriotic fervor and medieval pageantry unmatched in a quarter century, Britain laid its troubles aside Tuesday to celebrate the silver jubilee of the reign of Queen Elizabeth II.

Neither intermittent rain, gusting winds, the loss of empire nor the erosion of the British pound seemed to matter to the jubilant throngs lining procession routes from Buckingham Palace to the ancient Guildhall waving Union Jacks and chanting "We love the queen. We want the queen."

In her jubilee address at a festive luncheon at the Guildhall, the 51-year-old monarch recalled how as a princess of 21 she had pledged her life "to the service of our people, and I asked for God's help to make good that vow."

MILLIONS of Britons and foreign visitors lined every step of the Queen's way in London. Millions more celebrated the holiday in open-air parties in village and town squares throughout the British Isles, and hundreds of millions watched the proceedings on television around the world.

Not since Elizabeth's coronation 24 years ago had so many Britons turned out for a national celebration, and their fervor testified to the immense popularity of the woman who has ruled through some of the bleakest years of Britain's history.

When her reign began, unemployment was at 203,000 and the pound was one of the proudest currencies in the West. Today there are 1.31 million jobless, the pound is worth four times less than 25 years ago and Britain is staggering under a $17 billion foreign debt.

Service assists troubled students

By KimLianne Washington
Collegian Reporter

Lafene Student Health Center offers a variety of services, but one of the least-used is the Mental Health Service (MHS).

Out of 18,000 students, only around 400 use the service each year, said Bob Sinnett, MHS director.

The low-cost service is available to all students who pay health fees. The first five consultations are free and following sessions are one dollar each.

"Two-thirds of the students that use this facility are self-referred and walk-in or ask for an appointment," Sinnett said. "The other students are referred to the service by other doctors on staff, professors or advisors."

THE MENTAL Health Service

is staffed by one psychiatrist, two psychologists, two psychological social workers and two interns.

When students go for consultations, they are evaluated by two methods, an interview and a personality test, to determine the severity of their difficulties, Sinnett said.

The interview is used to observe what the patient says and his actions. Often, close relatives or friends may be interviewed to give the doctor more insight to the patient's problem.

The personality test is given because the patient will write feelings more readily than telling them to someone, he said.

SINETT CITED two types of therapy a student can go through, individual or group psychotherapy. For extreme cases of depression and anxiety, medication is administered to aid in relieving symptoms while the student is going through psychotherapy.

"Students do not have to feel that they need help to use the Mental Health Service," Sinnett said. "Many of the students come to group therapy to achieve a better understanding of themselves and the people around them."

ANXIETY, depression and difficulties with interpersonal relationships are the most common illnesses treated at the Mental Health Service, Sinnett said. Less common are those caused by drug dependence. MHS treats two or three drug-related cases each year.

In these cases Sinnett said, the doctor tries to make the patient realize he can't stop using drugs without help. Many of these patients are admitted into Lafene for detoxification or withdrawal. Students are not generally given any medication unless their dependence is long-term and severe.

MHS does follow-up reports on patients to determine if treatment has been effective.

Young tries to clarify racist remark: also accuses Kennedy and Johnson

WASHINGTON (AP) — U.N. Ambassador Andrew Young met with President Carter on Tuesday after Young told a committee that he would "rather be fired for doing what is right" than to retire as a diplomat who never accomplished anything.

There was no indication what Carter and Young talked about. There was no sign that Young was in danger of losing his job, however, despite a White House disavowal of his remark in a published interview that former Presidents Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford were "racists."

EARLIER Young testified before the House International Relations Committee and extended that description to former Presidents John Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson as well. But Young said he didn't intend it to apply to the personal character of any of the chief executives.

Racism, he said, is "a kind of insensitivity to the problems of race and culture, but it is a very unfortunate term."

Young told the committee that in his interview with Playboy magazine, he had referred to Ford and Nixon as racists "in the context of why we might have neglected Africa...the question is whether it was a part of the formulation of our foreign policy."

BUT THE reference to presidential racism continued to draw strong protests from Republicans. Following up GOP National Chairman William Brock's demand that Young be fired, Sen. Barry Goldwater, R-Ariz., said after a White House meeting Tuesday that the one-time civil rights activist should never have been given the U.N. post.

He said Young was putting "both hands, both feet and his hat" in his mouth at the same time, and added, "I don't like anybody, black or white or brown, running around the world telling the world how they're supposed to run their countries or the world. That's their business, not ours."

In the House hearing — called to receive Young's report on his recent tour of African countries — Rep. William Broomfield, R-Mich., said the reference to Ford as racist was "an insult to a very great man," deserving of an apology.

Summer intramurals offer varied sports

Intramural sports available to men and women this summer are slow pitch softball, handball, tennis, horseshoes, racquetball, three-on-three basketball, two-on-two volleyball, one-on-one basketball and badminton.

There will be singles and doubles competition in handball, tennis, horseshoes and racquetball. Three-on-three basketball, two-on-two volleyball and one-on-one basketball competition will take place without the aid of officials.

THE FOLLOWING co-recreational sports also will be available: slow pitch softball (five men and five women), tennis doubles, racquetball doubles, handball doubles, horseshoe doubles, badminton doubles and two-on-two volleyball (no officials).

"If time allows, men and women's tournaments will be scheduled after the above activities are completed," Raydon Robel, director of Recreational Services, said.

Entries for all sports are due in Rec Services by 5 p.m. June 15. All sports begin June 20.

AEROBIC DANCE will be the only exercise program available, Robel said. The aerobic dance program is open to all students, faculty and staff, and will be offered Monday, Wednesday and Friday from 12 to 12:30 p.m.

Students, faculty and their families may check out athletic equipment at the L. P. Washburn Complex from 2 to 8 p.m., Monday-Friday; 10 a.m. to noon Saturday and 4 to 6 p.m. Sunday.

A validated university I.D. card must be presented to use university facilities and to check out equipment.

Ft. Riley Blvd. speed limits change

Students returning to K-State from the west on K-18 may have noticed some speed limit changes between Seth Childs Rd. and Yuma St.

The speed limits were raised along that portion of Ft. Riley Blvd. in order to bring the city into compliance with a new state statute prohibiting speed traps.

The statute prohibits speed limit changes of more than 10 miles per hour at a time, and the decrease from 45 m.p.h. to 30 m.p.h. on Ft. Riley Blvd. was found to be in violation of the law.

Because part of Ft. Riley Blvd. is a state highway, the state Department of Transportation had to approve the city's plan to raise some of the posted speed limits.

The new speed limits, coming into Manhattan on K-18 from the west are: 55 m.p.h. until Richards Dr. (near the bowling alley), 45 m.p.h. until Delaware Ave., 35 m.p.h. until the intersection of 17th St. and Yuma and 30 m.p.h. on 17th St.

UFM proposes move to Straube

By LISA SANDMEYER
Collegian Reporter

Its second proposal to rent vacated Straube Scholarship House will be decided upon by the K-State Endowment Association on June 28.

The original University for Man (UFM) proposal offered to bring Straube up to building code standards and lease the property for one dollar per year, said Sue Maes, director of UFM. The board of directors of the Endowment Association rejected this proposal.

The new proposal, still in the planning stages, offers rent of $4,750 per year, the same amount UFM pays at its present location, 615 Fairchild Terrace.

UFM would also pay the costs of meeting building code and fire marshal specifications at Straube.

"UFM is growing phenomenally," said Brad Henson, agriculture senator. The advantages available include more space, easier access and off-street parking available at the new location.

UFM's landlord has threatened to cut off their lease, Henson said, because she feels she could make more money by turning the house into apartments. Renting a building from the University would eliminate the problem.

"Right now, the UFM proposal is the only one up for consideration by Endowment," Henson said. A land developer and a sorority considering the property withdrew.

"UFM moving into Straube would minimize (Endowment's) costs," Henson said. "Right now, Endowment must pay taxes and upkeep on a vacant building."

FEDERAL regulations requiring educational institutions to meet certain accessibility codes for the handicapped could prohibit the move, Henson said.

"Unless an exception is made, we might have to put an elevator in and the cost would be out of our reach," he said. To pay the costs of repairing Straube, UFM plans to take out a loan and hold a fund-raising drive to pay the loan.

"There are several things that need to be done to bring Straube up to the fire marshal's standards," Joe Rippetoe, UFM business manager, said. "It's possible (moving UFM), but there's about 10 hurdles in between."

IF UFM moves to Straube, some senators would like to see the other social services put their offices there, also, said Cindy Thomas, student senate chairman.

"Most of them (social services) don't want to move because they feel they'll be out of the mainstream of student traffic," Thomas said.

The Drug Education Center and the FONE Walk-In Crisis Center, presently housed at UFM, will move the UFM if the proposal is accepted by the Endowment Association.

Manhattan officials respond to gay controversy

A Dade County, Fla., ordinance that banned discrimination in employment and housing based on a person's sexual preference was overturned June 7.

Anita Bryant, who gained prominence as a promoter of the Florida Orange Growers Association, fought against the ordinance. Jack Campbell, owner of a nationwide chain of gay bathhouses, led the attack for the ban.

The U.S. House of Representatives is currently considering a bill which would nationally prohibit discrimination against homosexuals.

EVEN IF the House bill passes, it would be of little significance in Manhattan, said Diane Rausch, K-State director of Affirmative Action. She believes Congress was backing away from the bill to see which way Dade County voted.

"We're very marginally, if at all, connected with the (gay rights) issue," Rausch said. "Without a federal mandate it is entirely outside the jurisdiction of this office."

"Homosexuality has never been an employment issue at K-State," she said. "I've never dealt with it and I have trouble understanding why there is such a big flap about it."

Rausch said she favored the House bill.

"It is a clear-cut case of human rights," she said. Rausch believes gays should be able to be open about their sexual preferences without penalty.

THE EVENTUAL effect of a gay rights law may undermine discrimination guidelines already on the books, said Cornell Mayfield Jr., Manhattan director of Human Resources and Equal Employment Opportunity.

He believes the congressional bill and the Miami ordinance both have problems because "the clowns who pass these laws never think about enforcement or guidelines for investigations."

"The difficulties with investigation and enforcement would completely undermine their effect," Mayfield said. "I would favor such a law, however, if funds and staff would be made available for enforcement."

He called the issue a "Mickey Mouse matter" and said laws would be passed just to keep troublemakers quiet.

"While everyone has a right to his own religious and moral beliefs," Mayfield said, "along with this right comes responsibility."

"We're swept away in a new movement of sex and pleasure. The foundation of our society, whether people want to admit it or not, is the family."

HOMOSEXUALITY signifies decay of the family structure, he said.

Mayfield believes gays will not have much impact as teachers in public schools and said parents must take care of the problem by teaching their children "in the manner in which you would have them go."

Teena Hosey, former director of Gay Counseling Services, said passage of the Dade County referendum is not only a setback for gays, but for the United States as well.

"A lot of people made a big mistake," she said, in reference to the passage. "Someday, when their civil rights are in danger, I hope they remember this day."

"By losing the referendum, the gays have lost a battle, but not necessarily the war," Rausch said. "Sex preference should not be a matter on which discrimination in jobs and housing should be based. It's a personal, private matter."

ALTHOUGH anti-gay forces have received support from many religious organizations, Rev. Daniel Scheetz, chaplain at St. Isadore's Catholic Church, said he is in favor of anti-discrimination laws for gays.

"I believe we should look at homosexuals as persons first," he said. "Men should not be labeled because they have a sexual orientation different than our own. I had to work hard to break down my prejudices."

ANITA BRYANT'S fears about gay teachers influencing children may be legitimate, Scheetz said, but his acquaintances with homosexual priests has led him to think differently.

"In no way do they (gay priests) abuse others because of their homosexuality," he said. He described gay priests as being productive and sensitive.

Hosey said gay teachers are better, too, because of their increased sensitivity.

Firefighters, city reach agreement

By CHRIS WILLIAMS
City Editor

The Manhattan City Commission, culminating a year of negotiations, Tuesday night approved a "memorandum of understanding" between the city and the International Association of Firefighters, Local No. 2275.

The understanding, termed a "favorable and reasonable agreement" by City Manager Les Rieger, calls for a pay increase of $765 to be divided over a one year period.

This represents an increase of $63.75 per month for the firefighters. The union had asked for a $100 a month increase.

This agreement eliminates the percentage pay increase plan and offers a flat rate increase to all (See FIREFIGHTERS, page 2)

Carter confident about IRS audit

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Internal Revenue Service is auditing President Carter's tax returns for 1975, when he used income averaging and a $41,702 tax credit to cut his tax bill, a presidential spokesman said Wednesday.

Carter "feels he has no problems" with the 1975 return, said White House Deputy Press Secretary Rex Granum, but the President wants the IRS to audit his tax returns regularly from now on while he is in the White House.

Granum said he did not know what prompted the current IRS audit or who had requested it. He said Carter hadn't. And Granum added: "It did not come from a computer printout." He referred to routine computer selection of returns for auditing from persons with large incomes and big deductions.

The spokesman also said he did not know when the audit began or whether it was started during the administration of Carter's Republican predecessor, Gerald Ford. Asked whether Carter felt the audit is politically motivated, Granum replied: "There's no feeling on our part that it is."

The IRS has "no particular interest in a specific thing that we're aware of," Granum said. He referred reporters to the tax agency and to Carter's accountant, Robert Perry, of Americus, Ga., near Carter's home town of Plains.

Both declined comment. The general practice of having the IRS audit Carter's returns is "in the best interests of everyone concerned," Granum told reporters. "He (Carter) has made all of his tax returns public since 1965. And this is just in keeping with making his financial affairs as a public official public."

Granum's statement came after reporters sought comment from the White House in response to disclosure of the audit by Newsday, a Long Island, N.Y., newspaper. It and other newspapers reported that the President's brother, Billy, had said in the past several weeks that his entire family was being audited.

Neither Carter's mother, Miss Lillian, nor Billy could be reached for comment immediately in Georgia. But Atlanta lawyer and long-time Carter adviser Charles Kirbo said he understood the IRS was auditing the family's peanut warehouse.

Granum noted that Carter's 1975 return, which was made public by the President during his campaign for the White House, includes a "big portion" of income from Carter's partnership in the warehouse with his mother and his brother.

The tax return shows Carter paid $17,484.14 in tax that year on an income of $136,138. The return shows he took a $41,702 credit related to purchases of farm machinery. A credit is subtracted directly from taxes owed.

Carter's tax return for 1975 shows the bulk of his income, $119,244, came from his peanut seed business, Carter's Warehouse. He also reported $3,293 in income from his autobiography, "Why Not The Best?"

Kansas medicaid share cut; nursing home review cited

TOPEKA (AP)—A proposed $1.89 million cut in Medicaid payments of Kansas could cause real financial problems for the state unless the action is modified before the end of next fiscal year, according to Robert Harder, secretary of the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services.

Harder said it was too early to assess the impact of the Department of Social and Rehabilitation services announcement Wednesday that $142 million in Medicaid payments would be cut to 20 states, including Kansas.

The cut is being made because the states failed to meet requirements for reviewing the quality and efficiency of nursing-home care for the poor.

"It's still early in the fiscal year," Harder said Wednesday. "I know that HEW people are working to get a change in federal legislation to modify the action, either make it less severe or give us a grace period."

HARDER said since the action affects so many states, he expects serious consideration in Congress to altering the proposed cuts.

HEW Secretary Joseph Califano Jr. said he was taking the action because the law requires it, but said he would urge Congress to change the law to restore the funds and set new requirements for the states.

Harder declined to speculate on what would happen to Medicaid programs in Kansas if no change is made in the proposed cut by the end of the next fiscal year, but admitted, "We'd have some financial problems."

Harder said the problem in Kansas came in the western region of the state, where SRS had difficulty getting inspection teams to 14 nursing homes. He said the vast distance separating the facilities was major stumbling block in making the investigations of Medicaid-approved homes in order to comply with the federal requirements.

Commission approves firefighter pay raise

firefighters. The increase will go into effect January 1, 1978.

RIEGER said the flat rate increase was accepted over the percentage increase because those making more money would receive a higher increase.

"We're trying to get a fair increase for everyone," Rieger said. "It costs everyone the same amount of money to live."

The increase also raises the starting salary for new firefighters to $718 per month.

ED PHELPS, union representative, echoed Rieger's contention and said the firefighters found the city to be "tough" in the negotiations.

"But on the other hand they are very fair," Phelps said. "I feel the city has taken giant strides in upgrading their fire department."

The new agreement also redefines the firedriver classification. Under the old agreement, two years of firefighting experience were needed to be classified a firedriver. The new plans call for only one year's experience.

ONE ADDITIONAL work shirt and blanket will be provided to the firefighters under the new agreement and the city will pay up to $24 for a new pair of work shoes for the firefighters.

The 56-hour work week will remain, but the new agreement calls for light duty work to be performed on holidays. No training will be done on these days. Housecleaning will remain a required duty.

The new plan stipulates that a person who works in a higher classification will need 10 working days before receiving pay for that level of work.

WASHINGTON (AP)—Cuban President Fidel Castro says there were more than 15,000 political prisoners in Cuba during the early years of his regime but says "maybe two or three thousand" such prisoners currently are jailed.

The unusual public disclosure came in an interview with ABC news correspondent Barbara Walters, scheduled for broadcast tonight.

Castro said now "maybe two or three thousand" prisoners are being held in Cuba for "different counter-revolutionary activities." He credited a decline in counter-revolutionary activity with reducing the numbers and said "when the activity of the U.S. was more intensive against Cuba, we reached a point of having more than 15,000 prisoners."

WASHINGTON - Expressing concern for the safety of the nation's former chief prosecutor, the Federal Bureau of Prisons said Wednesday it is sending John Mitchell to a small prison camp in Alabama where he can be watched more closely.

Mitchell, once President Nixon's presidential campaign manager and his attorney general, will serve his term for Watergate crimes at the minimum-security camp at Maxwell Air Force Base in Montgomery, Ala.

"We are naturally concerned about his safety as a former law enforcement officer," the prisons bureau said in a statement, "and we are placing him in a smaller minimum-security camp where it is believed he will be secure."

BLOOMINGTON, Minn.—Larry Hisle slammed a home run in the bottom of the 10th inning, his second of the night, to give the Minnesota Twins a 9-8 victory over Kansas City Wednesday night.

Glen Borgmann had brought the Twins back from an 8-5 deficit with a two-run shot in the bottom of the ninth off loser Larry Gura, 3-2.

John Mayberry hit his 9th and 10th homers for Royals, the second one giving the Royals the 8-6 lead in the sixth.

DETROIT—Two Filipino nurses were acquitted by a judge Wednesday of some murder and poisoning charges stemming from mysterious injections given patients at the Ann Arbor Veteran's Administration Hospital nearly two years ago.

U.S. District Court Judge Philip Pratt, however, said the jury should decide several remaining counts and ordered the defense to open its case today. Defense attorneys said defendant PFilipina Marciso, 30, of Ypsilanti, would be the first witness.

The action does not affect the penalty the nurses could face if convicted. Under federal law, life imprisonment is the maximum sentence for both murder and poisoning.

WASHINGTON—The House refused Wednesday to cut former President Richard Nixon's federally-subsidized staff and office fund by $148,000 to compensate the government for taxes owed but never paid for 1969.

By a 34-19 show-of-hands vote, the House rebuffed an attempt by Rep. Edward Koch, D.N.Y., to cut Nixon's $169,000 allowance to $21,000 to take out for the 1969 taxes.

WASHINGTON—President Carter made a special deal Wednesday to show off daughter Amy's tree house to an 8-year-old victim of cystic fibrosis.

Carter did so when he was visited in the Oval Office by Robbyn Foxx, a 6-year-old Emporia Kansas girl and the poster child for the annual fund appeal of the Cystic Fibrosis Foundation.

Britons barred from leaving Uganda

BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Radio Uganda announced Wednesday that British residents would be barred from leaving that East African nation, evidently in retaliation for Britain's efforts to keep President Idi Amin from attending the Commonwealth Conference in London.

The summit opened with the Ugandan seat conspicuously empty and with the exact whereabouts of Amin, reportedly on his way to London, still a mystery.

The restriction on an estimated 300 Britons living in Uganda was the latest in a bizarre series of claims, threats and rumors surrounding the brash dictator's pledge to crash the summit meeting despite the opposition of other Commonwealth leaders reacting to his alleged reign of terror.

THE GRADUATE SCHOOL has announced the final oral defense of the doctoral dissertation of Paula Walter at 9:30 a.m. in Holton 102b.

The latest move recalled a similar ban imposed on about 240 American nationals in Uganda five months ago after President Carter declared that reports of mass arrests and killings in Uganda had "disgusted the entire civilized world." The ban was lifted after four days.

THE OFFICIAL Uganda radio, quoting a spokesman for Uganda's vice president, Mustafa Adrisi, who was reported to be in charge while Amin headed for London, said a decision on the "plight" of the British would have to await the president's return.

Adrisi was quoted as saying that Ugandan security forces had been directed to insure that no British nationals leave the country. The report, monitored in Kenya, said the troops were told to watch for "such likely movements to defy the directive such as slipping through minor outlets like Mbale and Lake Idi Amin."

Mbale is near the Kenyan border, and Lake Idi Amin is near Zaire.

Adrisi ruled out the possibility of an Entebbe-style raid to rescue the Britons "since most British nationals are scattered over the country."

MOST of the British in Uganda are missionaries who elected to stay in the former British colony after London broke diplomatic relations with Kampala last July 28. British interests in Uganda are now handled by two officials working in the French Embassy. They declined to comment on the embargo.

Radio Uganda maintained that the 6-foot-4, 250-pound Amin, apparently aboard a military plane borrowed from Libya, had stopped over in an Arab country.

Keep off the grass

The landscape at K-State took quite a beating last spring. In an effort to save a few seconds on the way to and from classes, many students chose to take short cuts right across many lawns which resulted in worn dirt lanes zigzagging randomly across campus.

Physical Plant has no choice, then, but to assume the dirt paths are the wishes of the students and turn them into concrete walkways. An example of this is near Ackert Hall, where the path between Ackert and Claflin Rd. got so bad it is now being covered with cement. The same fate appears certain for the lawn between the East dorm complex and Petticoat Lane, which was re-seeded last Spring and is already being torn up.

FORTUNATELY, some of the student-made walkways have recovered during the short break before summer school, aided by the heavy rains.

Unfortunately, the same thing will probably happen again this summer. The landscape (grass, shrubs and other plants around campus) will be especially vulnerable when it gets dry and students are anxious to save a few steps to quickly get into their air-conditioned classrooms.

Many efforts were made last spring to plant new grass and to keep students from ruining existing grass.

THERE IS no excuse for turning an otherwise attractive campus into an unsightly network of labyrinthine sidewalks other than sheer laziness and complete disregard for the real beauty of the University grounds.

There is no shortage of sidewalks at K-State. All of the buildings on campus are connected to each other by existing sidewalks.

It's up to the students. They can either refrain from cutting new routes across campus, or they can be the proud owners of what will amount to little more than a glorified skateboard race track.

Even the worst-worn trails have time to recuperate before the hordes return this fall.

Gays are people, too

Last summer in western New York, I met an exquisite Italian named Michael. We saw each other constantly until one night I saw him out with another date. I was disgusted; I never wanted to see him again.

Jealousy? I wish it had been that simple. My reaction was engendered by fear. Michael was handsome, sophisticated, rich — and gay.

His "date" had been another man and they both had been wearing cosmetics. Mutual friends explained that Michael was a bisexual and said it was "very Kansas" of me to treat him differently because of this.

THE Dade County, Florida, ordinance banning against discrimination against gays has been overturned, while the U.S. House of Representatives is brewing over a bill which would prohibit nationally such discrimination.

It's an issue which I faced personally with my Italian friend, because, in essence, I discriminated against him for being gay.

The reversed ordinance has left Floridian gays alive, but has destroyed a part of their liberty and left a damper on their pursuit of happiness. Their sexual preferences aside, gays are just as human as Anita Bryant and have the right to conduct and control their own lives.

ONE OUT of every 10 Americans is gay, according to Teena Hosey, a former director of K-State's now defunct Gay Counseling Service. That is a significant enough part of our population to make us stop joking about it and consider it as the human rights problem it is.

We have shaped gays into a public minority, violated their right to privacy and caused fellow Americans some degree of mental anguish.

This society seems to have a history of doing that — consciously and subconsciously oppressing a segment of its population into submission until, inevitably, they have to stand up and fight for basic human rights.

WE HAVE seen this happen on the basis of race, nationality, gender, age and now sexual preference. The next thing you know, we will discriminate against people for how they go to the bathroom, if we don't already, that is.

Look at the positive side of homosexuality. It increases the sensitivity of the individual and it seems that's one area in which some of us could use assistance.

Think about what you would do if your lover, close friend or family member said he was gay. Your outlook on the issue of gay rights would probably soften.

Let them engage in whatever type of human relationships they desire, as long as they don't try to indoctrinate those who are against it. For all you know, that nice, wholesome teacher at the grade school may be a child-abuser or murderer.

Man, woman or human?

When a person is born society assigns him the traits associated with his sex. Boys are encouraged to be aggressive, dominant and decisive and are discouraged from demonstrating tenderness or complacency. Society deems that in order for these persons to become complete men, they should participate in sports and be competitive in every undertaking.

Girls are cuddled and protected and assumed to be tender, compassionate and passive, because they were born female. Girls, according to society, should give way to their male "superiors" and accept a submissive role.

BUT AN undercurrent of change promises to challenge these stereotyped roles. Androgyny, which literally means man-woman, is an inconspicuous phenomenon.

It is unexpressed in hairstyles, clothing styles and lifestyles, but it is presently limited to the well-educated and intellectuals.

Androgyny is not a sexual perversion. It is a style of personality which incorporates traits once assigned specifically to one sex.

As an example, women who wear men's clothing and enter the work force in a traditionally male role, may or may not be androgynous. It depends on her state of mind. If she feels and acts dominant, aggressive or independent and synthesizes these traits with the female traits she already possesses, she is androgynous.

A MAN who may hold down a high-level executive position can be androgynous if he demonstrates traits such as tenderness and compassion.

Androgyny is not a recent phenomenon, but history has given it a perverted sense and has placed androgynous men or women in roles of "sissies" or "dykes."

Behavior should have no gender, no stigma of sexuality. Human behavior is just that, human behavior. Our reactions to situations are often attributed to our sex, when, in fact, a person of the opposite sex may react similarly to the same situation.

Often, traditional sex roles can be restrictive to an individual's emotional development. A man who has never cried or experienced any emotion is cutting out a piece of life. A woman who has never stood up and said, "No," to something she didn't like is missing a vital part of growth.

WHETHER we grow as men or women should not be the overwhelming concern of society. We should strive to grow as humans.

Perhaps if androgyny were more widely accepted as a social norm, we could learn to understand each other better.

Too often, men exclude women from conversations or gatherings because, in their eyes, it is a discussion or meeting for men only. And, if the person is excluded because she is a woman, the men are only perpetuating the myth that women are not human.

Women do the same thing when they exclude men from conversations or gatherings. Women also assume men cannot understand, just because they are men.

Androgyny allows the full development of the human. It unties gender and sexual orientation from human activity and allows one to perform in a more constructive manner.

Society may never condone androgyny, but it seems to provide a clue to the path toward human understanding. And with more men and women reversing roles, the stigma may wear off in the future and allow individuals to become complete humans.

Energy proposal will not meet goals

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Carter knowingly set overly optimistic conservation goals that the energy plan he sent to Congress will not meet, the General Accounting Office said Wednesday.

Only if Americans voluntarily save more energy or if stringent mandatory measures are enacted can the President's goals be reached, the GAO said in a critical new analysis of the Carter energy package.

Urging the administration to redesign its plan to bring goals for 1985 in line with specific

Rebate plan dead; tax bill in trouble

WASHINGTON (AP)—President Carter's proposed rebates for buyers of energy efficient cars are dead, the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee said Wednesday.

One of several Ways and Means members who oppose the proposed stiff tax on gas-guzzling cars said there is at least a 50-50 chance of killing that provision as well.

As the Ways and Means Committee adjourned for the day, its chairman, Rep. Al Ullman, told reporters, "The rebate for purchasers of fuel-efficient cars doesn't have any support at all."

HOWEVER, Ullman said a majority of the panel wants a gas-guzzler tax, but he predicted it would not go into effect before the 1979 model year.

Some opponents are pressing for a delay until 1980. Carter wants it to take effect on 1978 models as soon as it becomes law.

Rep. Joe Waggoner, D-La., told reporters that 20 of the 37 members of the Ways and Means Committee were ready to vote against the rebate on Wednesday. He said he is advising against delaying the tax because that would weaken the case for removing it from the energy tax bill altogether.

In an effort to cut national gasoline consumption 10 percent by 1985, Carter proposed a tax of up to $2,500 on inefficient cars and a rebate of up to $500 for purchasers of efficient models.

THE REBATE ran into trouble immediately when congressmen realized that much of the money would come from buyers of American cars and be paid to buyers of imported cars.

proposals, the congressional auditors said:

"Based on the administration's own estimates, with few exceptions, the plan will fall short of the goals — even if the plan is fully implemented.

"We believe that it is somewhat incongruous to ask the Congress to establish a set of national energy goals, and then propose a national energy plan that is not expected to achieve them," said the GAO.

As the GAO report was delivered to Rep. Jack Brooks, D-Tex., chairman of the House Government Operations Committee, another House committee voted approval for a portion of the energy plan covering wind- and solar-powered cooling systems.

THE HOUSE Ways and Means approved a maximum $2,000 tax credit for windmills or solar devices installed by homeowners between April 1977 and the end of 1982. Those tax credits are among the voluntary portions of the energy plan that the GAO said will do little to solve the energy crisis.

"Based on the administration's estimates, it does not appear that the conservation provisions of the plan will cause much reduction in energy demand," the GAO said. Instead, the agency said, "The major impact of the plan ... seems to be reducing oil imports by shifting to coal rather than by conserving energy."

GAO analysts said they asked Carter's energy advisers for specific estimates of what the plan would do, then compared them with goals announced in April when the energy package was sent to Congress.

In almost every case, the publicly announced goals were substantially more optimistic than those Carter hoped to achieve if the energy plan wins approval in Congress.

For example, Carter set a goal of limiting annual growth in energy demand to 2 per cent by 1985, but his advisers estimate the plan only will hold growth to 2.2 per cent.

In addition, the GAO auditors criticized Carter's energy advisers for using 1977 instead of 1976 as the takeoff point for comparing likely energy reduction under the plan.

The GAO said the White House chose a year when gasoline and other energy use was expected to be higher so the contrast with later years will be sharper than it would have been had 1976 been chosen.

If 1976 were used instead of 1977, gasoline consumption could be reduced by 5 per cent instead of the 10 per cent figure projected by the plan, according to the GAO.

A substantial source of energy waste in the U.S. results from underinsulated or uninsulated houses. The administration estimated that tax incentives included in the energy plan will encourage adequate insulation in 90 per cent of American homes. The GAO said the best that can be hoped for is 60 per cent.

"Unfortunately, the vast majority of the actions in homes are deliberately designed to be voluntary," the report said.

The Ways and Means Committee narrowly voted on Tuesday to allow homeowners or renters a tax credit of up to $400 for buying insulation and other house energy-saving devices. The credit would allow taxpayers to recoup 20 per cent of the first $2,000 spent on insulation and would cover expenditures from last April 20 until the end of 1982.

THE GAO said its own studies have shown "pretty clearly that voluntary actions in the residential sector are hard to achieve and difficult to sustain over a long period of time."

The GAO said administration officials have indicated that if its goals are not met, they may seek approval of measures that would force Americans to save energy.

Noting this, the report said, "Since under the best of circumstances plans designed to meet goals often fall short, we believe that the plan should be redesigned to provide a reasonable opportunity of achieving stated goals."

Learning Network answers questions

The University Learning Network (ULN) offers two main services to the campus and community, a telephone and walk-in center where the staff attempts to answer questions and special projects.

Coordinator Susan Small and Assistant Coordinator Mindy Fogelman manage the ULN staff which reduces from about 20 people during regular semesters to four or five in the summer.

"We average about 2000 calls a month during the fall and spring and only half that many during the summer," Fogelman said.

ULN's summer hours are 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. Monday through Friday.

ARE YOU SURE YOU KNOW WHAT FAMILY PLANNING IS ALL ABOUT?

If you think it means preventing unwanted pregnancies ... you are partially right. The right time for children and a family is when you are ready to be parents and not before. An unplanned pregnancy could mess up your educational plans ... your job ... your life.

But family planning means a lot more. Like:

- counseling young people about their problems and the effect that a baby may have on their health and future
- protecting the health of mother and baby
- counseling men on male responsibility and methods of birth control
- helping couples who want to have children but can't

It's important to know ALL about family planning ... it means more than you may have thought.

For more information, call the family planning clinic in your community, your local health department, or your own physician.

4-H'ers get a taste of KSU life

More than 800 4-H members who are here participating in the 54th State 4-H and Youth Roundup are representing 94 of Kansas' 105 counties this week.

The 4-H members are at K-State until Friday getting a dose of college life.

The program allows students from throughout the state, ages 14 to 19, to participate in classes, campus tours and talks.

"It's a career and college orientation," said Charles Bates, K-State extension specialist for 4-H and youth. "It also introduces them to what is available at a university and what K-State has to offer."

BATES SAID a high percentage of those who enroll at K-State are former 4-H members.

"This experience at Roundup is to some extent a recruiting program for the University," he said.

The visiting 4-H members are living in Haymaker, West and Ford Halls and are dining in the Derby Food Center.

Along with the walking tours through campus and planned programs organized by the K-State 4-H office, the students are also taking abbreviated classes and seminars.

CLASSES WERE offered in all colleges, and included Crop Production, Bovine Beautification and the Changing World of Radio, TV and Newspapers.

Each college also presented overview seminars, discussing the college departments.

"We're trying to identify what their interests might be so they'll have some idea when they go to college," Bates said.

He said the complexion of the Kansas 4-H program has changed "a great deal" since it began in 1910.

"4-H was originally a tool to work with the young to reach their parents," he said. "Today, the emphasis is on the development of boys and girls."

HE SAID there have been many changes since the national 4-H program began in the early 1900s. Originally the program began as a strictly agricultural-homemaking organization, but it has since evolved to today's diverse but cohesive organization.

He said it has changed for the better and considers 4-H a "very successful" organization today. Some of the more drastic changes include an additional emphasis on urban-suburban youth.

Today the organization is made up of about half rural members and half urban-suburban members.

THE FOCUS of the programs sponsored by 4-H has expanded as well. Along with added emphasis on urban areas came projects involving aerospace, community work and science-oriented activities.

Agriculture, however, remains a vital part of the 4-H organization.

Bates said the shift to urban-related areas has not detracted from the 4-H philosophy in Kansas. It has broadened the program.

When asked if the program helped to keep youth on the farm instead of migrating to the city, Bates said it didn't directly keep youth home, but it does stimulate interests in activities related to agriculture and makes 4-H members more aware of opportunities in agriculture-related fields.

The program will finish Friday with a speech by Omer Voss, executive vice-president, International Harvester Co. Voss is a native Kansan and former 4-H member.

Committee probes Korean influence

WASHINGTON (AP) — A House committee probing alleged Korean influence-buying asked all 434 House members Wednesday to voluntarily list any cash or favors they received from five South Koreans.

However, the committee members acknowledged they would not force their colleagues to answer the questions. And they said congressmen who omitted answers or who have misleading answers to the questions would not be penalized or publicly chastised.

The decision to seek the voluntary cooperation of House members came as committee investigators disclosed they are seeking ultrasecret U.S. intelligence reports, one of which is said to quote the president of South Korea as ordering payoffs to American congressmen.

Chairman John Flynt, D-Ga., and special counsel Phillip Lacovara refused to tell reporters what specific intelligence the committee is after.

BUT LACOVARA told the committee "the basic question" is whether South Korean rice dealer

Tongsun Park was acting as a foreign agent for the Korean government when he dispensed cash and gifts to congressmen.

The Washington Post reported last year that a U.S. intelligence report quotes South Korean President Park Chung Hee telling Tongsun Park during a meeting in Seoul to make payoffs to American congressmen to keep them friendly to Korea's interests.

A former director of the Korean Central Intelligence Agency, Kim Hyung Wook, is quoted in several news interviews this week as saying that meeting did occur.

Burglar foregoes preliminary hearing

Lewis Sloniker, 19, agreed Wednesday to forego a preliminary hearing and was held for trial in Riley County District Court for two burglaries in Manhattan.

At least 107 burglaries in north-central Kansas since last fall have been blamed on Sloniker and two other boys from Seattle, Wash., who were arrested with him in Manhattan. All were at taverns and restaurants and involved the filing of vending machines.

Sloniker was in leg irons when he was brought before Judge Jerry Mershon Wednesday. He escaped briefly from an officer who was taking him to court for an earlier appearance.

The next legal step, his arraignment in district court, was set for July 5.

Stephen Sloniker, a 17-year-old brother, and Patrick Schy, 16, face charges in juvenile court, but they escaped from jail at Clay Center and have not been recaptured.

Musketeers frolic

New twist to old comedy

BY JIM CHALFFANT
Collegian Reviewer

"The Three Musketeers" offers an old-fashioned, romantic adventure with a twist.

Based on Alexander Dumas' novel of the same name, its emphasis is on comedy.

Viewers should be wary of the plot of this movie. Although enjoyable, it is difficult to follow if you aren't familiar with the story. The scenes and characters change often which sometimes leaves the audience behind.

Basically, "The Three Musketeers" is the story of the adventures of D'artagnan, played by Michael York, and the three musketeers he meets.

THEY FIND themselves mixed up in a complicated tale of several characters. A cardinal wants the king's power, a duke falls in love with the queen and other classic plot complications arise. The plot is good but important only as a vehicle for the comedy, so don't let it get in your way.

Comedy is what counts in this movie. The heroes are more than just swordsmen. They also have a talent for using every trick imaginable on their enemies. The fight scenes are well-planned delights and feature such tricks in the form of first-rate slapstick.

Although all the acting is good, Michael York deserves special mention for his performance as D'artagnan, the hero and main character of this tale. Follow him from a youth wanting to be a musketeer to his triumphs throughout the movie.

BACKED BY the other three, York is successful in his difficult role. You can't help but like him with his professional blending of greatness and clumsiness.

There's a lot of violence in "The Three Musketeers", but it shouldn't offend anyone. It is all in good taste and a lot of fun.

D'artagnan and friends are at their comic best during a romp of swordfighting.

Aside from the tricky plot, there's nothing to stop you from liking the movie. It has an all-star cast, including York, Faye Dunaway, Raquel Welch, Oliver Reed, Charlton Heston and Richard Chamberlain.

Excellent costuming and set design combine with Michael Legrand's soundtrack to create a good setting and memorable characters. Throw it all together and the merger of adventure and comedy in "The Three Musketeers" is a successful

Ethical violations provoke censure

TOPEKA (AP)—Public censure of Lyon County District Judge R. E. Miller was recommended Wednesday in proceedings filed with the Kansas Supreme Court.

The recommendation was made by the Kansas Commission on Judicial Qualifications.

The commission said following a hearing that it found that Miller had violated two canons of judicial ethics by asking another judge to dismiss a traffic ticket for a friend, or to reduce the fine to five dollars.

The commission said it was filing the proceeding with the Supreme Court, a move making the file public, since Miller had not responded within 20 days to the commission's finding and recommendation for public censure.

THE COMPLAINTS against Miller were filed by three former court employees from Emporia, Cheryl Humphrey, Shelli Shafer and Karen Johnson.

The three told an identical story. They said that Miller came to Lyon County Judge Darrell Meyer while they were present. They said Miller asked Judge Meyer to dismiss a traffic ticket a friend of his had received.

The three women said Meyer refused.

They said Miller then asked if Meyer would reduce the fine to five dollars but Meyer said he would not.

Desegregation plan okayed for Kansas City schools

KANSAS CITY (AP) — Despite disagreement from the Justice Department, District Judge Earl O'Connor Wednesday approved a desegregation plan for the Kansas City schools.

The plan would close one junior high, make a high school into a center for gifted students and allow students at three predominantly black elementary schools to transfer to six predominantly white schools.

"The court is convinced that the defendant's plan is the least disruptive and most effective, educationally sound and administratively feasible proposal of the various alternatives that have been examined throughout these proceedings," Judge O'Connor said.

The U.S. Department of Justice criticized the plan because the blacks would be doing most of the transferring.

Cowen's new style works

KANSAS CITY (AP)—Al Cowens at the plate is a little reminiscent of a sandlot player who's using a bat that's too heavy for him.

But the hard-hitting right fielder for the Kansas City Royals credits his new droopy batting style for much of his success so far this season.

"My batting stance has really helped," says Cowens, who hit only three home runs last year as a regular but hit his 10th of the season Tuesday night.

"I'd say it's the biggest thing. One day in spring training it just came to me when I was in the batting cage. I started dropping my bat down and that was it," Cowens said.

It isn't a picture-book stance even if it is productive. Cowens holds the bat limp wristed, with a loose grip and the fat end of the bat drooping almost to his waist.

IT LOOKS like the bat will fall out of his hands, but it doesn't, and Cowens whips it around by the time the ball reaches the plate. He says the new style keeps his hands in back of him before the swing and keeps him relaxed and loose before the pitch.

Cowens already has more homers than in any of his eight previous seasons in professional baseball except for 1973 when he hammered 16 at Jacksonville.

He leads the Royals in home runs, runs batted in with 39, triples with nine, runs with 34 and slugging percentage at .561. He batted .265 last year but his average was .303 going into Wednesday night's game at Minnesota.

"The main thing is confidence," he said. "Last year I got down on myself. I knew I could do better. This winter I worked out every day with a group of other major leaguers and I was really ready when spring came."

COWENS' NEW-FOUND power hasn't gone unnoticed by his teammates.

"He is swinging with more authority and that comes from experience," said center fielder Amos Otis. "He has learned the pitchers and is picking out the one he likes and knocking the cover off."

Relief pitcher Mark Littell, who benefitted from Cowens' hitting and picked up the victory over Boston Tuesday night, is $1 richer.

"This friend of mine down in spring training couldn't believe that he could ever hit like that," Littell said. "I said, 'Oh yeah. I'll bet you a dollar that he has 10 home runs this year with it.'"

Spelling bee's opening day disqualifies 68 competitors

WASHINGTON (AP) — "Balbriggan" and "polissoir" were no trouble. But the words, "pedestal" and "veneer" disqualified contestants in the 50th National Spelling Bee's opening rounds Wednesday.

After seven rounds, 68 of the 94 starting contestants had taken the short, painful walk from microphone to door, their hopes dashed and their chance at the $1,000 first prize doomed.

The seven-round first day was not without its mistakes — on the judges' part as well as the spellers.

Stephen Glasgow an 8th grader from Circleville, Ohio was given the word "sympiosis," in the seventh round. The official pronouncer, Richard Baker, repeatedly inserted an extra syllable and Stephen spelled the word as he heard it: sym-bi-o-sis.

WHEN IT was ruled a misspelling, a murmur rose from the audience. After repeatedly listening to a tape recording of Baker's pronunciation, the judges announced that Stephen's error would be overlooked because the word had been mispronounced at least three times.

They gave Stephen a free ride for the seventh round.

Until only two contestants remain, a single mistake is sudden death. Sometime this morning the final two will go head to head. If one makes a mistake, the other has a chance to spell the word correctly and gets one further word. The one who clears that hurdle is champion.

The contestants heard and spelled correctly such words as "bathymetry," "dolomitic," "bibelot," and "cognosce."

But everyone can spell those.

Zoo supervisor sought following cat-killing furor

By EDMUND EJEKAM
Collegian Reporter

During a furor over the killing of a stray cat at Manhattan's Sunset Zoo over Memorial Day weekend, Ken Stevenson resigned as zoo supervisor. City authorities are looking for a replacement.

Stevenson, who became supervisor last March, allegedly killed a stray cat on May 27 by flinging it against a wall. Unnamed zoo patrons reported it to the Riley County Humane Society, who took the matter to Jim Manning, superintendent of Park Resources.

Stevenson was given a two-week suspension from his job on the day the incident occurred, pending an investigation of the case. However, he resigned the next day.

"I resigned due to the loss of support from some people in town," Stevenson said. He refused to identify these people.

"He resigned because he knew what he had done was wrong and that it was going to hurt the zoo," Manning said.

"We have exotic cats and stray cats pose a problem to the larger animals," he said. Usually when extermination of animals is necessary, it is done with drugs and not violently.

STRAY CATS could carry an infectious disease (distemper) which can be deadly to the larger zoo animals, Manning said. The cats are also hostile to the zoo keepers.

Sunset Zoo is one of the few zoos without a mice and rat problem. The stray cats help control the wild rodent population, he said. It is planned to rid the zoo of the stray cats and introduce healthy kittens in their place.

As they grow, the kittens would be tame, friendlier to the zoo keepers and would be cared for medically. The acting zoo supervisor, Jeff Warner, placed the present population of strays at about 20.

SUNSET ZOO, founded over 30 years ago with a burrow and one racoon, contains over 200 animals of about 50 species. Also housed in the zoo is K-State's mascot, Willie the Wildcat.

The only major change the May 27 events will bring to the zoo is a new supervisor.

"We do not need to adopt any new policies since it has not been our policy to exterminate animals that way," Manning said. "The main criteria for hiring a zoo supervisor are experience in zoo management and knowledge of animal care."

Psychiatrists can coerce patients

By BARBARA RUST
Collegian Reporter

Psychiatrists have powers over other citizens and deprive people of some of their basic human right, Charles Storr said Thursday at the Department of Modern Languages International Lecture Series.

Storr, a psychiatrist at Warfield Hospital, Oxford University, England, and author of books including "Human Aggression" and "Sexual Deviation," said the psychiatrist has three duties to prevent these powers from growing out of proportion:

-To keep coercion over patients to a minimum.

-To be sure the government doesn't confine anyone except for psychiatric purposes.

-To assure healing and research techniques wouldn't be used by police or military against patients.

THE POWER of coercion, however, can't be entirely taken away from psychiatrists, Storr said. Some people have little control over themselves and don't realize whether or not they have a lack of rational thought.

"Psychiatrists must retain some power to confine people involuntarily and to confine people who are paranoid," Storr said. "These people think someone is going to kill them and they want to kill their persecutors."

Although Storr believes these powers need control, he said psychological research has been misused by his own country.

Psychological pressure has been used in war to get information from prisoners.

"GREAT BRITAIN instructed the Irish in using psychological pressures to get information from the Irish Republican Army prisoners," Storr said.

Governments have also used drug-induced hypnosis to get information from prisoners, he said.

Sensory deprivation has been used to get information including prevention of communication, sleep, eating and human contact.

"Physical brutality is not only the kind of brutality that mattered," he said. "Sensory deprivation is also a type of brutality."

Sensory deprivation produces deterioration including a lack of control, hallucinations and attitude changes. In controlled experiments at Princeton University, sensory deprivation "is very like a bad trip on LSD," Storr said.

"Doctors may be under considerable threats themselves if they don't take part in the interrogation," Storr said. "I don't blame my colleagues at all."

As a safeguard, a psychiatrist could be at the interrogation and warn when it has gone too far, but this doesn't consider the doctor's ethics.

"It is no part of a doctor's duty to oversee interrogators and inform them when a man can take no more," Storr said.

"The blame should be to those who many years ago thought that in emergency situations this could be used."

Because article three of the Declaration of Human Rights says no one shall be tortured, Storr said countries could challenge those governments which abuse psychiatry.

"I think we should concentrate on the law," Storr said.

Orientation leaders prepared to begin

Summer orientation for incoming freshmen and their parents begins today.

Fourteen orientation leaders have been preparing since the beginning of the spring semester to handle an estimated 3,000 students and 1,000 parents.

"The orientation leaders were chosen last fall," said Marilyn Trotter, new student programs director of the Center for Student Development. "They must be at least a second semester freshman, no more than a second semester junior and have a 2.0 GPA when they apply."

"It (selection of leaders) was really tense for awhile," said Joanna Smith, junior in English and secondary education. "There were a lot of great people that applied."

The 14 orientation leaders were chosen from 94 applicants.

ONCE SELECTED, orientation leaders must take the course Problems in Family and Child Development and undergo two weeks of intensive training to learn about K-State.

"For the first time, orientation leaders will be pre-advising incoming students," Trotter said. "They will be helping students with some of the problems incoming freshman face, such as how to read a line schedule, how to balance courses, what type of courses freshmen usually take and what a lab means."

"This will make it easier for the student to work with the advisor when choosing courses."

The leaders are assigned groups averaging 15 students. Orientation will continue through June 30.

Amin's recent escapades might have been a hoax

NAIROBI, KENYA (AP) — Radio Uganda said Thursday that Idi Amin is not in Libya, London or Europe — but at home in Kampala. It appeared the unpredictable dictator may never have left his East African country.

The brief announcement, monitored in Nairobi, said Amin returned to the Ugandan capital after meeting "top revolutionary officials" from Tanzania and Zambia.

It made no mention of previous Ugandan announcements that the burly military ruler was headed for the Commonwealth conference in London in defiance of the wishes of the British and other Commonwealth governments that he stay away.

Thursday's was the latest in a string of bizarre reports that placed Amin in Libya, in Britain demanding to be carried in a sedan chair, or in the skies over Europe looking for a country that would allow his jet to land.

British officials insisted the Ugandan leader had never entered the country, and during the three-day affair there were no independent reports of Amin's whereabouts.

In announcing the field marshal's return, the radio said one of the some 300 British subjects residing in Uganda had been arrested for spying and would face a firing squad if found guilty. Amin has refused to allow Britons to leave the country, at least temporarily.

Amin also ordered France to stop representing British interests in Uganda, as it has done since London broke relations with its former colony last July, the radio announced. Amin said he had "concrete evidence" British subjects were using the embassy for "subversive activities," according to the broadcast.

Observers in neighboring Kenya and in Britain speculated that the entire series of announcements, including the spy charge and the ban on Britons' leaving, was part of an elaborate Ugandan hoax to twist the tail of the British Lion.

Prime Minister James Callaghan and other British officials had told Amin he was not welcome for the Commonwealth meeting or the silver jubilee ceremonies.

Gas tax proposal killed by House

WASHINGTON (AP)—The House Ways and Means Committee Thursday rejected the 50-cent per gallon standby gasoline tax proposed by President Carter.

The action came after the committee approved a watered-down tax on gas-guzzling cars, rejected a rebate for purchasers of fuel-efficient cars and voted narrowly to repeal the current federal income tax deduction for state and local gasoline taxes.

And it came as another house subcommittee voted to free newly-discovered natural gas from federal price controls, a move long sought by the oil and gas industry. Administration officials said deregulation of new natural gas could raise the average gas bill of the 40 million homes that use gas by $100 a year in 1985. The administration wants to raise the price of natural gas somewhat but has proposed retaining price controls.

The vote against the higher gasoline tax, which would have been imposed only if gasoline consumption is not reduced, was 27 to 10. The vote came after virtually no debate and after some members had sought to adjourn for the day in order to delay consideration of the tax.

Carter's standby tax would have increased the present four cent per gallon federal gasoline tax by five cents per year over the next 10 years unless gasoline consumption stayed within specified levels.

The committee also rejected by a 25-to-11 vote a substitute that would have simply raised the current gasoline tax by three cents a gallon next Jan. 1, with the money being used to pay for energy research and transportation improvements.

Repeal of the federal deduction for state and local gas taxes would affect drivers who itemize their income taxes. It is worth $40 to $50 a year in tax savings to the typical driver who itemizes. Repeal would save the Treasury $700 million a year.

FRANKFORT, Ky.—No fire safety violations were found in a Jan. 27, 1977, state inspection of the Beverly Hills Supper Club where 161 people died in a Memorial Day weekend fire, according to records released Thursday by the state fire marshal's office.

There was a gap in inspection records from 1972 to 1975 which Fire Marshal Warren Southworth said he could not explain.

The latest entry in the file on the night club in Southgate was a handwritten nine-line report signed by state inspector John Bramlage Jan. 27.

BALTIMORE — The city's $21 million waste disposal plant, hailed as the answer to solid waste disposal problems in urban areas, was shut down Thursday because it can't meet state and federal air pollution standards.

Dr. Neil Solomon, Maryland's health secretary, denied Baltimore City a permit to operate the experimental plant, the only one of its kind in the country. He cited extensive pollution from the facility.

A recent survey showed the trouble-plagued garbage treatment plant, which uses heat to force rapid decomposition of garbage, emitted seven times more pollution than state clean air standards allow, according to the federal Environmental Protection Agency.

WASHINGTON — Rep. Martha Keys, D-Kan., said Thursday that Congress will take swift action to reverse an attempt by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to cut $1.9 million from its Medicaid payment to Kansas.

The cut was announced by HEW as a penalty for the state's failure to meet a March 31 deadline for review of all Medicaid patient care facilities.

"Kansas met the deadline for review of state mental institutions and skilled nursing homes and was only 4 per cent away from completing review of intermediate care facilities," the 2nd District congresswoman said.

Mrs. Keys said the Commerce Committee will take the matter up Monday and that she has been assured it will provide for an extension of time for those states which made a reasonable effort to comply with the HEW requirements.

LAWRENCE — A Kansas consumer group says nursing home regulations aren't being enforced and the announcement this week that federal Medicaid funding will be cut in the state only points up that fact.

Kansans for the Improvement of Nursing Homes said Thursday in a statement it was pleased by the decision to cut $1.89 million in Medicaid funding to Kansas. The Department of Health, Education and Welfare made the announcement Wednesday.

The group charged the Kansas Department of Health and Environment with failing to enforce state regulations and said the department needs at least 30 additional inspectors in order to achieve "an adequate number of unannounced inspections throughout the entire year."

ASSEN, The Netherlands — Mediators relaying a blunt government warning that time is running out spent four hours aboard a hijacked train Thursday in a new attempt to persuade South Moluccan gunmen to free 55 hostages held on the train and in a nearby school.

Dutch officials said the mission of the mediators was to spell out the government's view that the terrorists' position is hopeless, both "for their demands and for the political aims they have in view."

A highly placed source said the message was not an ultimatum. But other officials noted the possibility that the government might lean toward existing contingency plans to storm the two sites if the latest effort at mediation did not succeed.

Former K.U. basketball star dies

TUSTIN, Calif. (AP)—Danny Knight, former All-Big 8 basketball player at Kansas, died Wednesday night of injuries suffered in a fall three weeks ago.

Knight, 23, who played one season with Athletes-in-Action, which is headquartered here, had been suffering from headaches since last winter, a spokesman for AIA said.

Three weeks ago, he suffered a fall down steps at his home and doctors said he possibly had suffered a cerebral hemorrhage. He was placed in a respirator at Tustin Community Hospital, but never regained consciousness.

Knight is survived by his wife,

Arlene, a daughter, Tiffany, 4, and his parents. Funeral services and burial are tentatively scheduled for Wichita.

After playing with AIA, Knight was in basketball action briefly in Europe. At the time of his injury, he was preparing to go to the Philippines to join a team there, the spokesman said.

Outspoken Young; diplomatic mistake

United Nations Ambassador Andrew Young is suffering from a disease usually fatal to diplomats. Foot-in-mouth disease.

Young has succeeded in alienating our allies, infuriating the Russians and has generally made situations tense for the State Department.

This he has accomplished by opening his mouth when it should have remained closed.

Other countries' affairs have been Young's forte, until now. Now, he has decided to turn on his own country and has been blasting us all for being "racists." First, it was Nixon and Ford who were our number one "racists," then Kennedy and Johnson were accused. Will President Carter be next?

AND WHAT about Young? Can't he be called a "racist?" Not in the context of which he is speaking, but isn't he a "reverse racist?"

Young has been cheerfully attacking white persons, stereotyping them in the role of "racist," but hasn't anyone stopped to consider that he is discriminating against Caucasians?

Young claims he referred to our past Presidents as "racists," in the context that they have ignored our African friends while drawing up foreign policy objectives.

But, Young may not be the man to change that. If he isn't careful with his constantly flapping mouth, we may soon find our few friends in Africa turned to enemies.

YOUNG is not a diplomat. He doesn't seem to grasp the concept that diplomats are supposed to try to get along with our allies.

Instead, he seems to feel free, in his position, to tell every government what it is doing wrong. He often contradicts official State Department policy and provides needless embarrassment for U.S. officials attempting to cooperate with our friends overseas.

Carter seems to condone Young's outbursts. Maybe he doesn't know what to do with Young.

An idea would be to give Young a long robe, a staff, a mountain and let him preach to the world about the evils of its ways. He certainly does not belong in a diplomatic position.

Surviving death

Death is something we all must face. It is inevitable. And, while many regard the subject abhorrent, it should be discussed openly.

Many fear death, hoping not to face its finality. The fear surrounding death is perpetuated by the individual's feeling of uselessness, his desire to enjoy life and make life a rewarding experience.

Many fear death will come to them too soon, so they will not have time to accomplish what they desire.

UNUSUAL research has uncovered some surprising facets of life after death. A topic of religious meaning, and of great debate, no one is sure what he faces in the afterlife. Or even if there is an afterlife.

Persons who have faced death have an interesting and amazingly similar story to tell.

The persons interviewed by the researchers were ones who had come close to dying, even those who had been pronounced dead, but had, through the miracles of science, been brought back to life.

THESE persons no longer fear death.

The story goes something like this; the person feels himself leaving his body and hears a loud buzzing or humming. Soon, he is able to look down upon his physical being and observe the resuscitation efforts being performed on his "lifeless" form, as if he were a spectator.

He feels a strange power, one unattached to his body. Others come to greet him, often family members and close friends who are dead. He also encounters a warm, loving spirit, often represented by a beam of light or a vague, bright glow.

This "being of light," asks him questions, focusing on his feelings about his life. The events of his life are then played out before him.

AT THIS point, he reaches a barrier, presumed to be the final hurdle between life and death. He feels himself being drawn back toward life. He resists, for now his experience and the feelings of serenity and peace which fill him are more desirable than life.

These persons do not go beyond the barrier, but return to the realm of the living.

The similarity of their stories has led to presumptions about life after death. Many assume such findings are proof that life does not end with the demise of the body.

A unique aspect of the research has centered on faith.

THE studies have been conducted in India, as well as the U.S. Those of Hindu faith related the vision of Hindu gods, while Christians often claim the being of light is Christ.

Skeptics claim the only proof the stories provide is that individuals hallucinate before they die. Another claim scoffs at the evidence, proclaiming the visions as not true experiences of death since all the stories are related by living persons.

Another explanation for the visions comes from those in the medical profession. They explain the body does not die at once, but in stages.

WHEN the heart stops beating, the brain can remain active for several minutes before the blood flow eventually stops and chokes the brain of life. If the heart starts pumping again, the person may recover.

The experiences of the person while his heart is silent are those told to the researchers.

Whether the findings are valid or not, the tales of surviving death are interesting and for those who fear death, comforting.

Death should not strike fear in our hearts and minds. We should look to it as the promise of peace and serenity.

Lateral drifts release your mind

With classes having already begun, I always like to sit back and see where I am, think about what I know and plan what I want to find out next.

You know where I am?

I'm in a lateral drift. I read about it in a book. And so you can understand what I'm referring to, I'll explain.

A lateral drift is when you reach a point in learning where you don't know where you're going. It's like whenever you are on the right track to find an answer, you take a tangent and are lost out in nowhere.

BACK to lateral drifts — actually, you know where you're going, you just don't know the route which will take you to that goal the quickest. For instance, you know that right now your goal is to reach the end of this article, so you can do something else.

But beside that goal you probably have a goal which deals with getting something worthwhile out of this article. And I know that my goal is to finish this article so I can do something else and also to present something worthwhile for you to think about for the rest of the day.

Oh, yes, lateral drifts. I know that by telling you what a lateral drift is I must be on the right trail to at least one of my goals, the worthwhile part. But to really know where I am going, I must know where I have come from. And I just came from telling you what a lateral drift is. It is when you reach a point in learning where you don't know where you're going. Right?

WRONG, because you do know where you're going. You're going to that goal which is to get something worthwhile out of this article, except you don't know how to get there. Isn't that so?

So, we are in a lateral drift together or are we?

Strange predicament. You are in a lateral drift because you know where you're going (to the end of this article) but you don't know where I'm going with the article. But you DO know where I'm going with the article. I'm going to the end of the article. And I know that because I'm typing it. But do I know where I'm going?

I'm going to the end of the article but isn't there something else I'm doing?

WELL, we are communicating because, obviously, you are reading what I am typing. And you know that there is some point which must be made for this really to be communicating.

But is that true?

Well, sort of, but that could be treated just like the goals over-worked so it means nothing at all.

I believe it is communicating because you know what a lateral drift is because you have just been in one.

Fast foods attract students

By KIM WASHINGTON
Collegian Reporter

A student enters a restaurant and fishes in his pocket, pulling out some coins.

Glancing at the menu, he counts his change and realizes he can't order because he doesn't have enough money. To avoid embarrassment, out of the restaurant he goes without his lunch.

Such scenes happen often to the college student on a limited budget.

SEVERAL local restaurants, however, offer food specials which students can take advantage of and still remain within their budget.

"Specials in Manhattan are most frequently taken advantage of by students and large families," said Mike Stitham, manager of Aggieville Pizza Hut. "Everyone is looking for reasonable buys," said Don Wilkinson, manager of Hardee's.

"People will really flock for specials—more for the money."

WILKINSON said he sells 25 per cent more hamburgers during their specials.

"Not only are people looking for bargains, but this is the day of the hamburger," he said. "People will come and order a hamburger before they would order a steak. I the shows to win free sandwiches, which they do," said Raoul Martinez, owner and manager of Marti's and Aggie Deli restaurants.

"People like to purchase things at a reduction, but also like to get things for free."

AGGIE DELI offers a weekly, noontime sandwich special which

(A&W) don't make any money on the specials we run. We just want to keep our customers coming back."

FOR BIG eaters or people with extra notches on their belts, Pizza Hut offers an all-you-can-eat buffet lunch.

"This time of year people want to eat salad, but will buy the special because it is all you can eat," Stitham said. "Students and professors frequent the special here in the Aggieville store."

The fast food nutrition report by Howard Appledorf in "Food Technology" says, "A combination meal of hamburger, fries and a shake can be an acceptable source of nutrition for an adult."

Low iron content was also cited in the testing of these fast food chains, but the Community Nutrition Weekly Report states, "With a balanced diet of fruits and vegetables, the frequenting of fast foods specials would cause no deficiencies in one's diet."

"Not only are people looking for bargains, but this is the day of the hamburger."

"A&W Rootbeer offers several specials," said Bob Pertee, A&W manager, "but only one is carried in all of the stores throughout the state and that is the Coney Dog."

$72 million highway to nowhere causes concern, leads to additional study

PHILADELPHIA (AP)--Taxpayers have paid $72 million to build a highway that goes nowhere. Now an additional $1 million is being spent on an environmental study to determine if the road should be completed.

"If we come up with an affirmative recommendation, it has to run through the federal department of transportation and all the departments down in Washington and they have to approve it," said David Sims, deputy secretary for highway administration for the Pennsylvania Department of Transportation.

"If we come up with a negative one, I guess that's the end of it."

IF APPROVED, at least another $144 million will be spent to complete the project.

At stake is Interstate 476, or the "Blue Route" a suburban Philadelphia highway. It glaringly points up the monumental problems that state and highway departments encounter every time they attempt construction in or around densely populated areas—mind-boggling costs, slow-moving bureaucrats and save-the-neighborhood groups.

"In 1974 environmental laws went into effect that made it necessary to redesign many highways that already were under construction," says Robert Wright, a design engineer for the highway department. "It was like starting out saying you have a free kick, then mugging the punter."

THE BLUE ROUTE, originally envisioned in 1928 by the borough of Swarthmore, has been surveyed, scrutinized and studied. One survey looked into the number of bears in Delaware County. None. Another at the number of box turtles. No one is sure.

The current environmental impact study is being prepared by a private consulting firm hired by the state. The price has increased from $500,000 to $1 million in a little over two years. The rough draft currently weighs about 10 pounds.

THE HIGHWAY would connect the Pennsylvania Turnpike at Plymouth Meeting to I-95 near Chester. It would be six lanes and 21.5 miles long.

When formally conceived in 1956, the cost was estimated at $34 million, compared to the $72 million already spent and the $144 million still to be spent if it is approved.

Foreign runners have unfair edge

By CHRIS WILLIAMS
Staff Writer

Last weekend's NCAA track and field championships once again served to fan the glowing controversy of the use of foreign athletes in American collegiate sports.

Since 1956 Olympic champion

Collegian Analysis

Ron Delaney's migration from Ireland to Villanova, foreign athletes have found open arms and homes in the United States to train and attend college.

Unfortunately, many problems have arisen. Colleges are importing ready-made runners to bolster their track programs and are ignoring the talents of their own runners.

THE NCAA was a prime example of this trend. Kenyans from Washington State and Texas at El Paso captured the 1,500 meter, the 10,000 meter and the 3,000 meter steeplechase, along with second place finishes in the steeplechase and the 5,000 meters. A miler from Lreland finished third in the 1,500 meter and a Canadian garnered second place in the high jump.

But why the furor? Simply, United States colleges such as Villanova, Texas at El Paso and Washington State are serving an injustice to American runners and track and field. By training these foreign runners, we are seriously undermining our chances of success at the international level of competition.

AT THE 1976 Olympics, for example, United States-trained foreign athletes won the 100 and 200 meters and would have possibly won more gold medals had the African nations remained in the competition. At the Munich Olympics, four bronze medals were awarded to foreign athletes from the U.S. with half of the winning Kenyan 1,600 meter relay team being U.S.-trained. And at Mexico City, the 400 meter intermediate hurdle champion was an Englishman trained at Boston College.

Probably the biggest complaint registered from coaches and athletes is that many of the foreign athletes are in their mid-twenties and are competing against U.S. runners who are still in their teens and early twenties. It is a common fact that distance runners do not reach their primes until they are in their late twenties, so many young United States runners are competing with foreign athletes who are just reaching their peaks.

K-STATE track coach Mike Ross believes that foreign athletes are in a class by themselves and should not be allowed to compete against younger American runners.

"It would be like bringing a major league team to play a minor league team," Ross said. "Of course the older runners are going to win."

"It's got to be frustrating for a kid to get the baton and have to chase an older runner. Unless the kid puts forth a superhuman effort, he's not going to win."

Ross believes coaches who recruit foreign athletes are "reaching for instant success" and trying to turn a team into a contender. But Ross won't follow that practice.

"That's not for me," he said. "I take a great deal of pride in the development of American athletes."

"Occasionally, if a team without foreign runners improves well enough, you'll bring in the talent that is international caliber."

ROSS and other track coaches are not advocating the prohibiting of foreign athletes, but rather putting an age limit on the runners. By limiting the age, a younger American athlete can run and try to obtain the confidence he needs to excel.

By becoming annihilated by an older runner, the younger runner could suffer mental hardship and lose the confidence much-needed to become a better runner. Only one American runner in the past 13 years was young and still able to win against older foreign runners and that was Jim Ryun.

In order to run, you must first learn how to walk. In order to compete internationally, you must first learn how to compete nationally. By importing foreign runners, American colleges are by-passing that all-important national competition level step, and the only ones getting hurt are the young runners.

Seattle Slew looks to triple crown while opponents ready for challenge

NEW YORK (AP)—"There's no disgrace being beaten by Seattle Slew," Billy Turner, trainer of the overwhelming Belmont Stakes favorite said Thursday.

And, obviously, the owners and trainers of nine other 3-year-olds agreed with Turner . . . and felt it was worth the gamble that Saturday might not be The Slew's day.

"Horses that never win another race have won at Belmont," said Turner. "Why not take a chance. It's good business."

But if the early odds are right, it's useless business. The Slew was made a 1-5 favorite to win his ninth race and become the first unbeaten Triple Crown winner in history.

"I think it's a compliment," Karen Taylor, the listed owner of Seattle Slew, said of the surprisingly large field.

"Everybody's out to beat Seattle Slew."

"I've never worried about Slew's competition, I never have," said Karen's husband, Mickey. "He can gallop faster than most horses can run. This is our playground this time; we're the home team." Seattle Slew is based at Belmont Park and ran all three of his races there last year when he was voted the 2-year-old champion.

"IT DOESN'T make any difference how many horses there are," Taylor continued. "Iron Constitution, Run Dusty Run, Sanhedrin, they deserve to be in the race, and the rest have high hopes."

Run Dusty Run, Sanhedrin and Iron Constitution had the best loser's look at Seattle Slew in the Kentucky Derby and Preakness.

The "high hopes" entered Thursday were Spirit Level, Sir Sir, Mr. Red Wing and the John Campo-trained entry of Make Amends and Hey Hey J.P.

If all 10 go to the post at 5:38 p.m., EDT, the 109th running of the 1½-mile Belmont will be worth $183,800, with $110,280 to the winner. However, Campo has indicated that Hey Hey J.P. will be scratched and sent to Philadelphia for the $25,000-added Keystone Handicap.

A victory by Seattle Slew would also make him the 10th winner of the Derby, Preakness and Belmont and the first since Secretariat, who in 1973 became the first Triple Crown champion since Citation in 1948.

Bucks plan as NBA draft opens

NEW YORK (AP)—The Milwaukee Bucks expect to do some instant rebuilding Friday when the National Basketball Association holds its annual draft of college talent.

Kent Benson of Indiana, the consensus All-American center, and Marques Johnson of UCLA, the forward who was major college basketball's Player of the Year, are both expected to be tabbed by the Bucks, who have the first and third selections in the lottery.

The Bucks also have the 11th pick in the opening round, meaning they are almost certain to come up with three quality players from this year's relatively lean college crop.

The Bucks have already said they plan to open the draft, which will last for 10 rounds and be held by telephone hookup from NBA headquarters to the 22 league cities, by picking Benson.

"Benson is the only pure post man available," said Bucks executive Wayne Embry of the 6-foot-11, 245-pound, two-time All-American. "It's him. There's nobody else."

Milwaukee earned the right to pick first by finishing with the worst record in the Western Conference, then winning a coin flip with the Kansas City Kings. The Kings obtained the No. 1 pick of the New York Nets, the worst team in the Eastern Conference, in the Tiny Archibald trade.

After the Bucks start things off at noon, EDT, the teams will pick in inverse order of their records during the 1976-77 season. But because so many trades have been made involving first-round draft choices, the actual order of selection will bear little resemblance to the standings.

THE KINGS wanted Benson, too, but when they lost the coin flip they traded for Seattle's veteran center, Tom Burleson. They are now expected to use the second pick in the draft on guard Otis Birdsong, a poised sharpshooter who is considered one of the few players in this year's group of eligibles who will be able to help a pro team right away.

The Bucks, picking third with a choice obtained from Buffalo for center Swen Nater plus the 13th pick on the first round, say they'll take Johnson if he's still available.

Gas supply at high level

NEW YORK (AP) — There's little chance of gasoline shortages this summer, industry observers say, but don't look for bargains at the pump.

As the peak summer driving season begins, gasoline inventories are at about their highest levels in recent years. But the observers say oil companies are storing the extra fuel rather than distributing it to wholesalers.

Even as inventories have been growing, the average retail price of gasoline has been increasing by about one penny per gallon per month since early spring. The price of gasoline usually rises in the spring and summer as driving increases.

ACCORDING to Platt's Oilgram Price Service, which surveys national gasoline prices, the average retail price for regular gasoline, including taxes, was 61.9 cents in March, 62.6 cents in April, and 63.3 cents in May.

Industry officials add that they expect the inventory to be reduced as the summer progresses.

"It's when there is a surplus that you see spot sales and price wars occurring, and we haven't seen any of that," Lundberg said. "What we are seeing here is judicious selling by the oil companies."

According to the American Petroleum Institute (API) oil companies said gasoline inventories at the end of last week stood at 256.7 million barrels, about 17 per cent above the 219.1 million barrels reported a year ago. There are 42 gallons to a barrel.

Female student survey reveals

College draws women back

By SUSAN BURDEN
Collegian Reporter

The desire for more education, a social search or the need to get back into the mainstream...whatever the reason, women who dropped out of college are coming back to K-State.

In a recent survey of female students over 30, Laura Folland, graduate in family and child development, found women reach a point in their lives where the normal routine makes a drastic change. This change, she said, often leads them to seek intellectual stimulation.

The survey said many women believe they must prove themselves to the world by returning to school. If they can be successful in school, it concluded, they believe they can be successful at home and in a career.

MARGARET NORDIN, associate director of the Center for Student Development, says women return to school for a variety of reasons.

"Some women have children in school and the mother wants to go back to school to complete unfinished business," she said. "Others return to school because of economic necessity or for intellectual stimulation."

"Many of the women are fearful that because they've been away from school for such a long time that they won't have any study habits left and will be unable to compete with other students," Nordin said.

DELORES HEMPHILL, a recent graduate in family and child development said she was scared when she first came back to school.

"It's hard to step out of the 'plain housewife' role when you've been brought up to believe that a woman's place is in the home," she said.

"I was one of those foolish women who got married at 18 and, after my children were in school, I felt a void in my life," Hemphill said.

"At school I felt very lonely at first because there was such an age difference between myself and other students," she said. "But after I got to know some of the students, I felt great and nobody minded my age."

"There was a lot of emotional conflict in my life when I started back to school, but I had my husband's support and encouragement. When I graduated I felt it was all worth while."

Hemphill is coming back in the fall to start work on a master's degree.

LINDA HARROLD, a senior in family and child development, said she "just had to go back to school."

"I felt I had to live up to my family's image," Harrold said. "They're all college graduates. Besides, I refuse to work as a waitress or sales clerk."

"When I graduate, I'll be trained for a job, be it a nursery school teacher or working with the elderly. I won't be stuck washing dishes," she said.

Sandra Emely, a freshman in family and child development, was motivated from an entirely different source.

"God was my motivation," Emely said. "To be a whole person I felt I must be exposed to everything. I felt intellectually inferior to others and decided I must be equal to them to understand them."

"For my own sake I went back," Emely said. "After a 23-year absence from school, I went back to learn how to deal with my surroundings."

"I took courses to supplant my life," she said. "A college degree wasn't important to me."

HARROLD differed in her opinion of studying for a degree.

Harrold believes she needs her college degree to "get a good, well-paying job."

Nadine Burch, an instructor who helps older students, said about 50 per cent of the women return to school to try for a degree.

"The fear of not knowing their way around and not being able to compete with the younger students impairs the older students' learning for awhile," Burch said.

EMELY agrees with this idea. "I was terrified at first, but I soon felt equal to the other students," she said.

Contraceptive sales extend to children

WASHINGTON (AP)--The Supreme Court ruled Thursday that states may not bar the sale of contraceptives to children or restrict where adults can buy contraceptives.

Voting, 7-2, the justices struck down a New York law that had placed tight controls on the sale of contraceptives. The court also ruled that states cannot ban the display or advertising of birth control devices.

In the main opinion, four of the nine judges said children have the same right to sexual privacy that adults have.

Under New York state's laws, youngsters under the age of 16 could obtain contraceptives legally only from doctors. Adults could purchase contraceptives only from pharmacists.

AS A RESULT of the court ruling, contraceptives will be able to be sold anywhere and children will be able to purchase them.

While few states have gone as far as New York in making contraceptives unavailable to youngsters, 17 states and the District of Columbia limit the places where adults can buy contraceptives.

While a majority of the justices found New York's law defective and ruled that the display and advertising bans were unconstitutional, only four justices joined in the court's main opinion declaring that children enjoy the same rights to privacy in sexual matters as do adults.

Museum will feature new home, displays

The official opening of the Riley County Historical Museum will be in September, Jean Dallas, director, announced yesterday.

Located at 2301 Claflin, the new structure adjoins the historic Goodnow House museum.

"Displays will include graphics and artifacts with an abundance of American Indian objects," Roy Bird, museum historian, said. "Some artifacts, though undated, are believed to date back to prehistoric times."

A large bell, on permanent loan from the First United Methodist Church, hangs from the ceiling in the main lobby. It was on the deck of the Hartford steamer which carried half of Manhattan's original population here in 1885.

THE SAME ship brought prefabricated houses to the Manhattan area including the Hartford house located just north of the museum.

Other exhibits include five convent windows, originally from New Orleans, and items from the Civil, Indian and World Wars.

Those items not on display will be located in a study collection area where they will be catalogued and available upon request.

"At present, staff and volunteers are working to unpack and record all the items which are still being moved from the old museum site in the Manhattan City Building," Dallas said.

After opening, hours will be 8 a.m. to noon and 1 p.m. to 5 p.m. Tuesday through Saturday.

Order requires KPL to alter deposit rules

TOPEKA (AP)—Kansas Power and Light Co. has been directed to meet certain conditions in requiring deposits before serving new customers, in what may be a precedent-setting order from the Kansas Corporation Commission.

In its final order of a Feb. 3 interim decision granting KPL a $7.98 million rate increase, the KCC directed that the firm can require a deposit no larger than double the average monthly bill, and must return the deposit after 12 months if the customer makes prompt payment each month.

The KCC order, issued Wednesday and made public Thursday, also directs KPL, which serves customers in northeast, east-central and southeast Kansas, to develop a formal plan for allowing customers on fixed incomes to pay their electric bills at the time they receive their income checks.

KCC Chairman G.T. Van Bebbler noted the Capitol Area Welfare Rights Organization, Inc., Topeka, which was an intervenor in KPL's original request for a $31.4 million rate increase, had pointed out the hardship faced by some when they have to pay utility bills before receiving their monthly income checks.

Directing the company to come up with the payment plan for low-income persons, and setting the conditions for requiring deposits is believed to be a first in a KCC order, although members of the commission were divided on whether it had ever been done.

Some utilities already have their own similar deposit policies.

Winston assists with 'Cat basketball camp

By EUGENE PERKINS
Collegian Reporter

A chance to hone their skills under Big Eight coach of the year Jack Hartman will draw an estimated 450 boys to his Wildcat Basketball Camp this summer.

The first of three sessions ended last week. The second began Sunday and the third runs June 19-24.

"We try to have one coach for every 10 or 12 campers," Hartman said. Darryl Winston, a K-State basketball standout who graduated last spring, also is assisting.

"I'm getting into coaching next year, so I'm learning a lot by helping with this camp," Winston said. "The kids are great. They're eager to learn and they give you their complete attention."

"The camp is very worthwhile. If a boy wants to learn the fundamentals properly, this is the place to come."

BESIDES RECEIVING instruction from the regular staff, the first session campers received a demonstration of basketball skills from George Lehman, a former American Basketball Association player now touring the country as a member of a Pro-Keds-sponsored basketball clinic.

"We stress the need for organization, self-discipline, unselfishness and the development of fundamental basketball skills at the camp," Hartman said.

Special emphasis is placed on teaching proper techniques of shooting.

ON AN average day, the campers spend about eight hours on the basketball court, receiving instruction in fundamental skills from Hartman and the rest of the coaching staff. The campers also participate in one-on-one competition, free throw contests and team competition.

"I really liked it," camper Steve Henson, 16, said of the camp. "You get to play against some really good players."

The campers, who pay $125 a session, are being housed in Moore Hall while the former Athletic Dormitory, now Edwards Hall, is being renovated.

Wildcat Basketball Camp is open to boys from ages eight to 17, except high school graduates.

White House staff still above Garter's pre-election promise

WASHINGTON (AP)—White House aides acknowledge that unless President Carter takes drastic action, he will not meet his goal of cutting the size of the White House staff by 30 per cent.

Carter's staff numbered 565 at the end of May, about 11 per cent larger than his predecessor's. The staff is down sharply from a March 31 peak of 693, and at least several dozen more jobs are expected to be transferred out of the White House or eliminated in the next few months.

That would put the staff on a par with its size under former President Gerald Ford, who at the end of his tenure had a permanent staff of 485 plus 25 persons borrowed from other government agencies.

But the staff would have to be cut to 357 if Carter were to honor his pre-inaugural promise to employ 30 per cent fewer aides than Ford.

Laetrile controversy continues; cancer victims, FDA disagree

By DENNIS BOONE
Collegian Reporter

Like other doctors, Robert Sinclair, superintendent of Lafene Student Health Center, wouldn't accept the risk of dispensing Laetrile, even if it were available to him.

And like other state legislators, Donn Everett is unfamiliar with Laetrile's capabilities, but knows he will sooner or later be called to vote upon its legalization.

And terminally ill cancer victims believe they are entitled to use Laetrile, legal or not, even as a last resort.

Day by day, the controversy over Laetrile grows.

IN HOSPITALS, courts, lawyers' offices and federal agencies, the drug, claimed to be a successful treatment for cancer, is becoming both a household and medicine cabinet word.

But what the drug is, how and where it is produced and whether it will prove to be a safe, successful deterrent to carcinogenic disease are all questions that make up a confusing issue facing the doctors, lawyers and terminally ill.

In layman's terms, the drug Laetrile consists of... crushed apricot pits. The apricot pits are ground into pill form, according to Science Magazine.

Crushed apricot pits. That in itself could be enough to raise a few eyebrows over the drug's effectiveness, but according to Ernst Krebs Jr., scientist, crushed apricot pits are the answer to a question doctors have been asking for years.

Science Magazine said Krebs' father first evolved the theory that the drug amygdalin, extracted from apricot pits, would start a chemical reaction within the cancer cells which would kill the disease.

The elder Krebs maintained cancer cells contain the enzyme beta-glycosidase, which, when coming in contact with amygdalin, would release hydrogen cyanide. The hydrogen cyanide would then kill cancer cells. Healthy cells, according to Krebs, would be protected by the enzyme rhodenase, which acts to detoxify hydrogen cyanide.

AS SIMPLE and appealing as the theory is, the Food and Drug Administration disagrees. The FDA will not allow Laetrile to be marketed in the United States until its benefits and possible dangers have been thoroughly researched and documented, Sinclair said.

"It's never going to pass FDA, let's face it," Sinclair said. "No sound, structured research has been done on it, although it does seem strange that a drug which has been around as long as Laetrile has could go unresearched."

The only way to obtain Laetrile is by going to Mexico, where much of the drug on the market today is processed, according to Science Magazine.

ACCORDING TO BACKERS of the drug, Laetrile offers relief from the agonizing pain of cancer, enhances the well-being of the user, and, in some cases, actually brings about total remission of cancer.

"People grind up some fruit pits and pass them off as a cure for cancer—they're never going to get it done, not here (in the U.S.) anyway," Sinclair said.

"In order for the drug to be legalized by the FDA, it must first undergo those controlled tests and show a statistical alteration of cancer cells in the patient."

"It must be compared to, say, placebo, and the end result would have to be that X number of patients receiving Laetrile recovered from cancer whereas X number of patients suffering from the same forms of cancer failed to show any recovery without Laetrile," Sinclair said.

"There is always a tendency, when a new drug is introduced, to have claims of its effectiveness often being extravagant and failing to hold up," George Bascom, a Manhattan doctor, said.

"Nobody knows all there is to know about cancer, and nobody knows all there is to know about drugs effective in treating cancer," he said. "But on the basis of tests conducted on animals by the Sloan-Kettering Institute, my assumption would be that Laetrile is ineffective in the treatment of cancer."

BASCOM SAID when a person has a far-advanced case of cancer, he has a right to take the drug. "People may know there's a one in 20 or one in 100 chance of remission, we don't know the exact figures. Overall, I am not impressed with its effectiveness. But I wouldn't recommend Laetrile."

"If a man has gone to a specialist and is told 'Look, buddy, you have an inoperable carcinoma and you have a year, maybe 18 months to live' why not let him try Laetrile? It might work, who knows? That's the argument now," Sinclair said.

THAT ARGUMENT is likely to confront state legislators in Kansas soon, Donn Everett, Manhattan state senator, said.

"I haven't heard of any move afoot to introduce a bill that would legalize Laetrile, but I'm sure that if eight to 12 states have legalized its use under the issue of civil rights, someone, somewhere is planning to do so in the Kansas Senate and the House," Everett said.

Sinclair said he could not administer Laetrile to a patient "in good faith." He said the drug must first be legalized and proved effective and safe by the FDA.

"I am not altogether familiar with Laetrile's capabilities so I couldn't say how I'd vote on it," Everett said.

FDA may propose 'fill-weight' labeling

WASHINGTON (AP)—Are you getting your money's worth from canned food? The government is considering a plan to make canners tell consumers how much solid food goes into a can before liquids are added.

Officials of the Food and Drug Administration say they soon plan to ask for public reaction to such a requirement, which would be the first step toward putting the plan into effect.

The FDA has been wrestling for several years with the problem of the best way of letting consumers know how much real food is in a can of fruit or vegetables.

Today consumers can find the net weight printed on a can, but that includes the water, syrup or other liquid in which the food is packed. Shoppers sometimes discover too late they have plenty of water, but not enough green beans for their family.

THE METHOD that the FDA expects to propose, probably early next week, is called "fillweight." It involves measuring the solid content of a product before water is added and the item is processed.

The canning industry suggested this method in lieu of a proposal advanced in 1973 by the Consumers Union.

CRB survey shows local pharmaceutical mark-ups

Nationwide research shows price mark-ups can be as much as 100 per cent on pharmaceutical products.

In Manhattan, there is wide variation in mark-up, sometimes as much as 50 per cent, according to the K-State Consumer Relations Board (CRB).

A recent survey done by CRB showed the consumer benefits by checking pharmaceutical prices before buying.

The survey's objective was to obtain prices of 17 commonly-used drugs from the 10 pharmacies in Manhattan and make the information available to the public.

EACH CRB member identified himself and asked for procedures and pricing information from the Manhattan druggists. If refused, CRB members then obtained prices through unidentified phone calls, Brenda West, CRB director said.

When first contacted, a few pharmacists were willing to participate in the survey, but later changed their minds.

"Most felt comparison pricing was unprofessional and would affect their business," West said.

"This type of survey not only creates ill feeling between pharmacists, but also is

Brewers beat Royals; KC loses shirts too

MILWAUKEE (AP)—Milwaukee's Jerry Augustine pitched a seven-hitter from a three-run fifth inning Sunday as the Brewers blanked the Kansas City Royals, 4-0.

The Royals were forced to play wearing the Brewers' road uniform shirts because the Kansas City clubhouse was burglarized Saturday night and 53 uniforms were stolen.

Augustine, 7-7, had not lasted more than two innings in his last two starts.

Milwaukee tagged Royals' starter Jim Colburn, 6-7, for three runs four hits.

A THIEF—OR THIEVES—broke into the visitors' clubhouse at County Stadium and made off with 53 Royals' uniform shirts, 20 gloves, 10 pairs of baseball shoes and 15 warmup jackets.

Thus all but seven of the Royals' crew of 25 players, four coaches and Manager Whitey Herzog had to wear Brewer road uniform tops for Sunday's game. Each Royal has two sets of road uniforms for a total of 60; now all but seven are missing.

Jim Csicsinski, manager of the visitors' clubhouse at the stadium, said he discovered the burglary when he arrived at the locker room at 9:30 a.m. Sunday.

degrading to our profession." Pat Dunne, owner of Dunne's Pharmacy, said. "Prices can't be compared by simply what is put into a bottle. Services rendered by each pharmacy should be considered."

ADDITIONAL RESEARCH was done by CRB on laws and attitudes connected with pricing. "Federal law through a court case states pharmacies can advertise if they choose to, but it is not mandatory," West said.

This law could prove to be an additional reason for pharmacists not wanting to participate in the survey, she said.

"If you are a student, Lafene's prices are cheaper—if they carry the drug," West said. "It does pay to comparison shop and your pharmacists can substitute a brand name for a generic name as a money-saver."

MADRID, Spain—Thousands of political rallies Sunday capped a final weekend of campaigning before Spain's first free elections in 41 years. The latest polls showed Premier Adolfo Suarez' centrist coalition and the Socialist Workers party leading a crowded field.

About 5,000 candidates and 157 political groups are running in Wednesday's parliamentary election. Surveys indicated one-third of Spain's 22 million voters were still undecided.

The new parliament, or Cortes, replaces a rubber-stamp appointed Cortes that existed under almost four decades of dictatorial rule by the late Gen. Francisco Franco, who died 19 months ago.

MOSCOW—Despite a chill in detente, American and Russian scientists are working on a revolutionary way to produce electricity. U.S. sources say it is an example of the West's benefiting from Soviet technology.

"We think it will be the most significant event in U.S.-Soviet scientific cooperation since Appolo-Soyuz," said one source, comparing the project to the 1975 joint Soviet-American space flight.

The process—known as magnetohydrodynamics (MHD)—uses ionized gas and a giant magnet to generate electricity. Scientists expect MHD plants of the future to be 20 per cent to 40 per cent more efficient than contemporary facilities that use coal, natural gas or oil, sources say.

The U.S. Energy Research and Development Administration plans to announce Monday that a 40-ton magnet will be flown to the Soviet Union on June 20 from Argonne National Laboratory in Illinois as part of the U.S. contribution to the project.

McALESTER, Okla.—Former U.S. Speaker of the House Carl Albert was released from McAlester General Hospital on Sunday after treatment for minor injuries received in a hit-and-run accident Saturday.

Albert, 69, was treated for cuts and bruises and walked out accompanied by his doctor, a hospital spokesman said.

Sampson Benjamin, 81, of McAlester was arrested several hours after the accident and booked on a complaint of leaving the scene of a personal injury accident, police said.

NEW YORK—The plans laid for Seattle Slew's assault on the Triple Crown have been carried out to perfection. Now the unbeaten colt finds himself in the option phase of his career.

"We're keeping all options open," said Dr. Jim Hill, the veterinarian who is half-owner of Slew. In the aftermath of the 3-year-old's Belmont Stakes victory that made him the first unbeaten Triple Crown champion, Hill mentioned two options:

—Race Seattle Slew in the Aug. 20 Travers and in some events this fall, then retire him to stud.

—Rest him for a fall campaign and race him again as a 4-year-old.

"We'll run him as a 4-year-old if he's sound," co-owner Mickey Taylor said Saturday in the heady atmosphere of the winner's press conference. The Slew races in the black and yellow silks of Taylor's wife Karen.

RUIDOSO DOWNS, N.M.—Prissy Gold Digger, with only $5,004 in career earnings, stunned the field in the $512,080 Kansas Futurity Sunday to collect the first place prize of $168,857.

The filly owned by Robert W. Moore of Oklahoma City won the first leg of the Triple Crown for two-year-old quarter horses at Ruidoso Downs by outscrambling favorites Diamond Chicklet and Blinkers Off to the wire for a one length victory in the 350-yard sprint.

Ray manhunt extends to mountain areas

BRUSHY MOUNTAIN, Tenn. (AP)—The relentless manhunt for James Earl Ray and three other dangerous criminals continued Sunday as state officials debated whether to call the National Guard to join the search.

Gov. Ray Blanton, who earlier issued instructions to state officials to take Ray alive, was scheduled to arrive at Brushy Mountain State Prison by helicopter later Sunday. He was accompanied by the Tennessee adjutant general, Maj. Gen. Carl Wallace.

Meanwhile, more than 175 law enforcement officers expanded their search area to 25 miles of snake-infested mountainous terrain on all sides of the Tennessee communities of Wartburg, Oliver Springs and Coalfield.

The reputed mastermind of the spectacular Brushy Mountain State Prison escape was recaptured Sunday, but Ray and three other convicts eluded the search. No one knew if Ray, convicted assassin of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., was still with the three other fugitives, but authorities believed the men had to split into two groups.

Lt. Bill Preston, information officer for the Tennessee National Guard, said two West Tennessee military police companies, totaling about 300 men, have been placed on standby alert.

After days of clear weather a series of mountain rain showers moved through the search area in midafternoon Sunday.

Jim Henderson, a spokesman for the governor, said experts told him the rain would enhance the dogs' tracking ability because it clears the air and because moist ground holds scents better.

Blanton said he had briefed U.S. Atty. Gen. Griffin Bell on the search. The statement said Blanton reaffirmed he has requested all law enforcement officers to use all possible caution and restraint to ensure Ray's safe return to custody. The statement also said Bell discussed with the governor the briefing Bell had given to President Carter on the situation.

C. Murray Henderson, the state's corrections commissioner, said speculation that authorities at the maximum-security prison helped Ray escape was "absurd, irresponsible and absolutely untrue."

He said that people seemed to think that "maximum security" means that the man would be locked up 24 hours a day in his cell.

"A few years ago a federal court ordered Ray released from his cell, from lockdown," Henderson said. "It shouldn't surprise anyone he is not in isolation."

Asked whether he thought the 49-year-old Ray would be able to survive for long in the rugged woods by subsisting on berries and roots, Henderson replied: "I think it could be pretty difficult. Any individual who had courses in mountain survival could do it."

He said guards at the prison don't think Ray's physical condition is that good.

Supervisor needs humane qualities

The actions of former Zoo Supervisor Ken Stevenson are unfortunate. What is more important now, however, is that the city finds a person to fill Stevenson's position—one who shares the same hopes for the future of the Sunset Zoo, but also one who believes in seeing them through.

Stevenson took the job last March. At that time he expressed hopes that the zoo could develop into a more natural setting and one which would be a healthy place for the 200 animals living there.

He wanted to turn the cement and steel cages into quarters more attractive to the visitors and more comfortable for the animals—an admirable goal.

He resigned when it was reported he threw a stray cat against the wall, killing it. This was hardly an appropriate attitude for an individual charged with the care of what has grown to be an impressive collection of wildlife.

THAT IS PAST, however, and it is now up to Superintendent of Park Resources Jim Manning to replace Stevenson with a qualified zoo supervisor.

Hopefully, Manning will be able to hire an individual who has positive aspirations for the future of Sunset Zoo and a genuine concern for its residents.

Manhattan has an unusually large and attractive zoo for a city its size, and with the amount of citizen support shown in the past through fund-raising drives, it can only improve.

The qualifications for the new zoo supervisor are clear. He or she must show a desire to continue the progress made at the zoo in areas of grounds and cage upkeep, children's zoo development, animal area development and above all, animal care.

Without a genuine concern for animal care—all animals, not just those in cages—a zoo has no right to exist.

The Sunset Zoo, with all the private and public support behind it, has a bright future.

But it must be placed in the hands of an individual with a zealous ambition to preserve what has been done in the past and with enough foresight and innovation to assure its future growth, beauty and humanity.

Social scientists study trivia

Social scientists spend a lot of time studying trivia. The government spends a lot of money supporting social scientists who study trivia.

By trivia, I am not referring to trivia questions, such as those which abound among students who have nothing better to do with their time. Trivia, in the context of this article, is irrelevance.

Irrelevance was a primary issue on college campuses in the late 60s and early 70s. Students complained about instructors who rammed irrelevant facts down their throats. "What future use will it be for me to learn the laws of physics?" they often asked.

The laws of physics may prove to be more relevant than what social scientists are rhetorically spouting now.

MY IRE has been aroused by a study I read about. It is not a new study. It has been previously conducted. But I wonder now, as I have wondered before, why this issue is worth study.

The questions under study are the appeal of men, or what physical attributes do men possess that women find attractive and what kind of women are attracted to what kind of men.

According to Human Behavior magazine, men with cute little rearends are supposed to be attractive to highly motivated, competitive and emotionally mature women while men with large rearends are attractive to more traditional women.

The article, which is reporting a study by university social scientists, goes on to state that women who like athletic men are less traditional than women who are attracted to smaller than average men.

WOMEN who like medium-sized men are likely to be majoring in home economics, the report states.

So what? I guess the era of women's lib has sparked interest in this area since studies about what attracts men to women have been conducted.

Men are attracted to women and women are attracted to men. It is true that some physical attributes may be more appealing to some persons than others. Again, so what?

Social scientists could better spend their time and money studying more important social phenomena, such as the effect of stereotyping on emotional development.

These kinds of studies continually try to place us all in categories, something I feel the individual is incapable of fitting into.

Here's something the social scientists can ponder. I like small, medium and large men because physical appearance doesn't necessarily matter to me. What category do I fit in?

Letters to the editor

Cowpaths result of poor planning

Dear Editor:

In response to Ken Miller's "Keep off the grass" editorial in the Thursday, June 9th Collegian...Yes, there are many worn dirt paths at various locations around the campus and not many people would argue with the claim that they are unsightly as well as offering all sorts of possibilities for wind and water erosion. However, let's not put all the blame on students who, more often than not, are not going out of their way to be inconsiderate of the grass, but rather are simply trying to get from one class to another by the shortest distance and in the allotted 10 minute time. It is not just a question of "sheer laziness" or "complete disregard for the beauty of the university grounds."

The dirt paths are not zigzagging "randomly" across campus as stated in the editorial. These paths merely indicate the natural, heavily traveled pedestrian routes between major destination points and are actually where some sort of paving should have been located in the first place. Some people might believe that if that reasoning were strictly followed, the entire campus would be paved over with concrete. I say not so. I contend that many of the existing sidewalks are little used and probably would not be needed in their present location at all if they had been located correctly when first built.

THE PROBLEM is that, traditionally, new sidewalks are built when a new building is completed so as to connect it with the rest of the campus. Often times these new sidewalks leading away from the new building are located in such a way that they look aesthetically pleasing or geometrically balanced on the architect's site plan, but not necessarily because that is where people will want to walk. At the very least, it should be a policy of the campus planners to carefully research all the possible implications of the siting of a new building with respect to the resulting changes in pedestrian circulation being generated by the addition of another destination point. The sidewalks should then be designed and located to be functionally useful rather than to form "pretty," but useless, patterns on the ground.

North Korea not passive

Editor,
Regarding Ken Miller's column appearing in the June 8 Collegian.

The interest of North Korea to eventually wage a successful war against the South is unquestionable. The desire to conquer is exemplified by the fact that in 1973, United Nations personnel discovered a secret subterranean passage that extended 150 miles into the Demilitarized Zone and into South Korea.

South Korea is not as invincible as many would like to believe. The North outnumbers the South in tanks, troops, planes, helicopters and ships (ie. North Korea has 16 submarines while South Korea has none).

MILLER IS in error when he maintains that detente and diplomatic relations with the United States will prevent the Soviets from supporting North Korea.

Despite detente, Russia recently poured $300 million in military aid to rebels in Angola, not to mention the enormous caches of Soviet weapons usually found in the hands of guerillas on almost every nation on the globe.

Students may have difficulty establishing credit accounts

By SUSAN BURDEN
Collegian Reporter

Acquiring credit can be difficult for a student who has no previous credit accounts.

B. Dale Thierolf of the Manhattan Credit Bureau said one way of establishing credit is to fill out a consumer inquiry form at the credit bureau office.

"It's much like filling out a credit application except we keep it on file," Thierolf said. "We can then use it to verify credit and help build up a file."

THE FILES kept at the credit bureau contain information about the person and his credit. Records are kept on file on how he pays his bills.

If he abuses his credit by not paying promptly, this information is kept and passed on to inquiring loan companies with whom the person has applied for credit. All information is kept for at least seven years.

"After you've filled out a consumer inquiry form, apply for credit in a local store, preferably in your hometown," Thierolf said.

Jack Ayres, head of the loan department at First National Bank, stresses the need for students to apply for credit in their hometowns.

"If a student applies through his hometown bank, most likely the bank is already familiar with his name and his family," Ayres said.

"The parents can act as co-signers on the student's applications."

"The best way of establishing credit with any bank is to open up a checking and savings account," Ayres said. "This shows the bank that a student can maintain a checking account without an overdraft and a savings shows he can budget his monthly income."

AYRES SAID another way of establishing credit is to open up a loan and put the money in a savings account as security.

Larry Schmer, credit manager for Sears, Roebuck and Company in Manhattan, takes family background into account when students apply for a Sears charge account.

"If they have no credit history available or if it's very limited, we check with their hometown bank and their families' background," Schmer said.

"It really helps if their parents have had previous Sears accounts," he said. "We also take into consideration the student's employment and his income."

SCHMER SAID it was probably easier to get credit in the small specialty stores than in the larger national retail stores.

"Small specialty stores can base their credit on much less than national retail stores," he said. "The larger stores have set requirements which take most of the emotion out of the credit decision."

"It's often easier," Thierolf said, "for a student to get a contractual account instead of a charge card."

CONTRACT ACCOUNTS are charge accounts where all purchases are kept track of at the time of purchase. The credit manager can more easily set limits and look after the account with less trouble.

According to Schmer, one good way of establishing credit is to take advantage of applications mailed to the student's home.

"Many national firms send out applications to students to promote credit cards," he said. "Sears is one of them."

K-State also has some credit facilities. University-funded loans are available through the Aids and Awards office.

A student may borrow up to $1,000 during his four-year sequence in college, courtesy of the alumni and endowment associations. This money may be used only for educational purposes such as enrollment fees, books, housing and so forth.

"You must have a co-signer for this type of student loan," said Jim Upham, associate director of Aids and Awards. "The co-signer can be anyone other than a spouse, preferably a parent."

"A student fills out an application and has an interview with a counselor," Upham said. "We check the co-signer's references and if they are satisfactory, we usually give the go ahead."

Controversial water projects face House debate this week

WASHINGTON (AP)- The House votes this week on two spending bills totaling $71.5 billion that President Carter has threatened to veto if they reach his desk without being trimmed.

One million dollars for a public works project in Grove Lake, Kan. may be trimmed from a $10.2 billion bill under consideration in the House.

Scheduled for consideration Monday, the bill includes 17 of 18 water projects that Carter says are not worth their financial and environmental costs.

Later in the week, the House will consider a bill appropriating $61.3 billion for the Labor and Health, Education and Welfare departments. The HEW appropriation is $1.4 billion more than Carter requested.

THE SENATE is expected to vote during the week on bills authorizing foreign-aid spending and increasing U.S. participation in international lending organizations.

Reps. Butler Derrick, D-S.C., and Silvio Conte, R-Mass., say they will offer an amendment to the public works appropriations bill to remove 16 of the 17 disputed water projects.

The amendment is encountering stiff opposition from advocates of the projects, but a leader of an environmental group predicted it would at least come close to carrying.

Brent Blackwelder of the Environmental Policy Center said opponents of the projects were confident of doing better than they did in April, when the House rejected, 252 to 143, a move to lower the budget ceiling for water projects by $100 million.

"If we get a one-third vote or better, it will assure a veto," the environmental activist said.

In the Senate, the subcommittee on public works appropriations will meet Wednesday amid reports that it may strike as many as nine of the projects opposed by Carter.

"The New Chuck Colson," a film describing what really happened to the White House Hatchet Man will be shown at Forum Hall, KSU Union on Wednesday, June 15 at 7:00.

Charles W. Colson, described by TIME Magazine as "Tough, wily, nasty and tenaciously loyal to Richard Nixon," at the peak of a brilliant law career became one of the President's closest confidants.

In December of 1973, in the middle of the Watergate Scandal, the headline "Colson Makes Decision for Christ" jarred Washington. Many people suspected a gimmick, while most who knew him as "Nixon's Hatchet Man" just laughed.

Then came his surprising plea of "guilty" followed by long months in federal prison. It soon became apparent that something real had happened to Chuck Colson. The cool calculating "Tough Guy" was different.

The film makes no attempt to stage or dramatize events nor does it attempt to justify what happened. In a straightforward manner it describes what made Charles W. Colson a new man.

Peacekeeping talks start after siege

ASSEN, The Netherlands (AP)—The Dutch government worked to patch up relations with the South Moluccan community Sunday and to head off further violence in the aftermath of the bloody end to northern Holland's long twin sieges.

Top government officials huddled with members of a joint Dutch-Moluccan community relations committee at an undisclosed site near Utrecht to search for ways to prevent new terrorist acts by young Moluccans or reprisals against the immigrants by angry Dutchmen.

Seven Moluccan terrorists and two of their 55 hostages were killed Saturday when Dutch commandos stormed a train and a village school that the gunmen had seized May 23.

SIX OF the terrorists were jailed pending a court hearing Monday, and the seventh was hospitalized in nearby Groningen with serious wounds.

Five of the 53 surviving hostages also were being treated for various injuries, but all were in good condition, a hospital spokesman said. The 48 other hostages passed up offers to remain in the hospital for at least 24 hours for observation.

As mediation efforts began, young radicals among this country's 40,000 Moluccan immigrants hinted that more terrorist actions were in store in reprisal for the deaths of "our comrades."

"Our revolution needs a lot more victims among our sons and daughters," said a spokesman for the radical Youth Liberation Front. "Maybe we'll have to go the same way as our friends."

SOUTH MOLUCCAN militants seek Dutch help in winning independence from Indonesia for their Pacific island homeland, a former Dutch colony.

The commission meeting was closed to the press, but sources said Moluccan members bitterly criticized the use of force against the terrorists.

A communique said both the Dutch and Moluccans at the meeting agreed "on the need to avoid creating illusions." Asked if that meant the Moluccans should give up the idea that the Dutch government can help create a Moluccan nation, Justice Minister Andries Van Agt said, "No, I cannot answer that question."

Researchers test sleeping bags

The Institute for Environmental Research at K-State provides a focal point for all types of interdisciplinary research.

As an example, one major camping outfitter recently contacted the institute to measure the insulating value of clothing. This action was taken because many manufacturers of equipment claim that a particular jacket or sleeping bag will keep the camper comfortable to 50 degrees below zero.

Many of these claims are based on exposure of a few people to the temperatures in uncontrolled conditions. Many government agencies are questioning these claims.

F.H. Rohles, director of the institute, explained that research is currently underway which will determine the clo value on a particular sleeping bag.

A CLO VALUE is the scientific measurement which determines the amount of clothing for a sedentary human to be comfortable at 70 degrees, 50 per cent relative humidity and air movement less than 40 feet per minute.

The Environment Research Laboratory of the Army, Natick, Mass., has loaned the institute a standard sleeping bag with which to standardize its procedure before actually doing the test for the company.

When the tests are completed the manufacturer will be able to place a clo value on a particular sleeping bag. This value can then be interpreted by the buyer before purchase.

Every increase in clo is equivalent to approximately 13 degrees in temperature. Thus, a sleeping bag of five clogs would provide comfort at five degrees above zero.

"With increased concern regarding consumer protection and information, it is only a matter of time before all garments and equipment for outdoor use will carry a clo value," Rohles said.

Lafene offers diet clinics

Two diet clinics are being offered by Lafene Student Health Center this summer.

Students will have a choice between an obesity clinic and a slim down nutritional clinic, according to Martha Olson, director of food service and nutrition.

Although the weight control classes have been offered before with success, they have not brought in seriously-overweight people to participate, Olson said. This is the reason she has organized the obesity clinic.

THE OBESITY clinic is "a brand new approach," Olson said. This clinic will work with students who are 30 or more pounds overweight.

"An evaluation will be taken of each individual and their needs," Olson said. "We will continue to use the same caloric point diet that has been used in my regular weight control classes."

The main stress of the obesity clinic will be in behavior modification.

"Students with a serious overweight problem need more than just a diet. They need a lot of reinforcement in other areas," Olson said.

The obesity clinic, which will meet in group sessions, will strive for short, intermediate goals. These goals may not necessarily deal with the person's weight, but with the way they eat or where they eat.

"Group sessions are very successful because people like to find out that others share the same problem. They can share with each other and find success by what someone else has found worked for them," Olson said.

The obesity clinic will meet

Wednesday from noon to 1 p.m. for eight weeks, beginning June 15.

THE SLIM DOWN nutritional clinic will be for students with a less serious weight problem.

The slim down clinic will be a concentrated, intensive education concerning the diet, nutritional ways to choose and eat food, how to use a food record, and how exercise will enhance dieting, Olson said.

The slim down clinic will meet Tuesday from noon to 1 p.m. for four weeks, beginning on June Tuesday.

Both diet clinics are open to students currently enrolled at K-State.

Goodwill tour pleases Carter; first lady impresses leaders

WASHINGTON (AP)—First Lady Rosalynn Carter returned home Sunday from a two-week goodwill tour and told her husband: "They love you in the Caribbean and in Latin America."

The President gave his wife a hug, kissed her on the cheek and told her she had met all the goals he and the State Department had set for her "almost with perfection."

He said her trip affirmed Latin American relations with the United States as ones of "close cooperation and equality of approach" to common problems.

CARTER CALLED his wife's trip "of great significance" and said Caribbean and Latin American leaders knew "it meant more to me to send Rosalynn—it was a much greater sacrifice to have her gone than the vice president or even the secretary of state."

Mrs. Carter's trip left foreign leaders impressed with her diplomatic skill.

"I like your country, your people, and the conversations with your president have been important," Mrs. Carter said in Spanish just before departing Simon Bolivar International Airport. "And now I'm going home to see Amy and Jimmy."

THE FIRST lady ended her seven-nation tour by meeting for 1½ hours Sunday with President Carlos Andres Perez, who arrives in the United States on June 26 for a six-day visit to Washington, New York and Chicago.

She said they discussed "human rights and energy" and "above all, the need to work together."

Perez, whose nation is a major oil exporter to the United States, described the meeting as a "really important opportunity to exchange points of view concerning subjects which are fundamental for Venezuela and for Venezuela's international policy."

BUT HE added, "It will be in Washington where we will formalize some agreements and make some decisions with President Carter."

Before the trip began, some South American officials privately expressed irritation that President Carter was sending his wife to meet with them and not a top government official, such as Secretary of State Cyrus Vance or foreign affairs adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski.

"There are too many people asking when Vance is coming down here," said one U.S. diplomat. But once they met her, many Latin American officials apparently changed their minds.

"Talking to a person who is so near to President Carter is a very good way to keep a strong link with the United States," said Colombian Foreign Minister Indalecio Liewano.

Mobile harvester follows ripening wheat

Record harvest begins in Kansas

ANTHONY, KS. — In 1948, Irvin Zecha asked his father for a loan of $800 to get him started as a custom wheat harvester. Today, Zecha owns not one, but three $40,000 diesel-powered combines and a fleet of trucks to transport he and his family from Oklahoma to North Dakota.

Zecha, along with other custom harvesters from surrounding states, diverged upon Kansas last weekend in anticipation of a record-breaking harvest. Zecha said that although production is high, averaging 30 to 40 bushels an acre, prices are far below normal.

While on the harvest trail, Zecha is accompanied by three of his five sons, his wife and a friend of his sons, Wayne Wilson, 16. Wilson said he's been along every year since he can remember. Now, he's more or less considered "just part of the family."

ZECA said his daughter came along for years, but this summer she had a pretty good job back home in Great Bend and he thought she would be better off to stay home.

Zecha, a resident of Great Bend, said they begin harvesting the day after school is out and wind up in August or September, when the boys have to go back to school.

Zecha's wife has not joined them yet this year, but she will soon, providing home-cooked meals while they're on the harvest trail.

Irvin Zecha with his three sons, Rocky, 19, Kelly, 17, and Clay, 16, along with Wilson have a long road ahead of them, but Zecha said if everything holds together through the summer, it will most likely be one of the best seasons they've ever had.

Top: Combines move across a field of wheat belonging to Julius Maddox. Above: Irvin Zecha talks with his son on the two-way radio. Above right: Zecha and his son, Clay, look for tools to repair a broken wheel. Bottom: Zecha watches nervously as nightfall approaches and a thunderstorm develops.

Pros, cons of the volunteer army; Is the quality of soldiers declining?

By RICK SEITZ
Collegian Reporter

The All Volunteer Army, since its inception in 1974, has filled the manpower needs of the Army as set by Congress.

"In fiscal year 1976, the Army had a quota of 192,114 and enlisted 192,703 men and women," said Jack Hollenbeck, public affairs officer for the Army recruiting command at Fort Sheridan, Ill.

In fiscal year 1976 about one quarter of those enlisted went into the combat arms fields of service, including infantry, airborne, armor and artillery, Hollenbeck said.

"In a survey we conducted in 1976 we found that job training, challenges and adventure, and education were the reasons most often given as to why people joined the Army. Monetary reasons were fairly low on the list," Hollenbeck said.

"People are no longer enlisting for duty, honor and country," said Sgt. Bobby Ward, Manhattan Army recruiter. "People are looking for a way to better themselves."

"The people of society think that we are the dumping ground for society. That is a bunch of bull. We are getting just what the schools put out," Ward said.

NOT EVERYONE trying to enlist in the Army is accepted. An applicant must first pass the mental and physical tests and be cleared with the police.

"We have had a lot of high school grads who could not pass the tests," Ward said. "We have had high school dropouts who have scored as high as 96."

In 1964, 67 per cent of all new enlistments didn't have a high school diploma. In 1976, 59 per cent didn't have a high school diploma.

IN A DEPARTMENT of Defense study, the total percentage of enlisted Army personnel with a high school diploma increased from 66 per cent in 1960 to 87.4 per cent in 1975.

"There is an active push of those who don't have high school diplomas to get them," Hollenbeck said.

"After a while you can tell who is going to make it in the Army,"

Ward said. "If I had my way as to what people could get in I would cut the number of those I screen by 25 per cent."

"The Army is looking for men and women that have completed two years of college," Ward said. "The only problem is other professions are looking for those people also."

"There are a lot of factors that influence the success of the All Volunteer Army," Ward said.

"The economy of the community is a big factor. If there is a lot of unemployment, chances are more people will come and see us," Ward said. "The recruiters' success is also determined by the support of the community."

THE GI BILL, while it was in effect, was an asset to the recruiters' efforts.

"I think it was a definite grabber while it was in effect," said Vaughn Bolten, public information officer at Ft. Riley. "But now we have the Veterans Education Program, in which the soldier contributes to his own savings and the Army matches it two-for-one."

The new package provides about $8,000 compared to the $18,000 from the GI Bill.

"I joined the Army because of the lack of jobs available here in Manhattan," John Dahlhauser, a private just out of basic training, said. "I wanted to better myself and I was getting tired of civilian life."

"I wanted to go to college but I couldn't afford it," he said. "This way I get most of my college paid for and the Army gives me a job."

"I knew what I was getting into when I signed up. My brother is in the infantry," Dahlhauser said.

"I don't know if I will stay in after my four-year hitch is up," he said. "A lot depends on how well these four years go and if I get enough credits to get most of my degree."

DAHLHAUSER SAID one of the major disadvantages of being in the Army is trying to obtain a loan. He had to have his father co-sign for the loan because he was in the Army, although he is now making more money now than when he was a civilian.

A 24-year veteran Command Sgt. Major who asked to remain anonymous talked about the problems of an All Volunteer Army.

"When the draft ended we lost the good, mature soldier," he said. "People you have talked to say that the soldier today is better educated. I don't think so. While I was a commandant at the (NCO) academy, aptitude scores were lower as compared to scores of previous times."

"Today I am worried about the quality of the soldier. I don't feel that soldiers are as dedicated today as they were years ago, mainly because the small unit leader isn't as dedicated. The small unit leader was trained in that era of permissiveness after the draft. As a result he doesn't know how to discipline his men," he said.

"I would say we get out to train as a battalion one month out of the year," he said. "The main problem is that many of the men are out getting their high school diplomas six hours of the day. I'm for education. I got three years of college credit while I've been in the Army on my own time, but these guys should have gotten their diplomas before they came into the Army. As General Patton said, 'The permanent job of the Army is to train for war, everything else is bullshit.'"

The All Volunteer Army does have its merits, he said. "I always felt we didn't get very much accomplished on Saturday mornings and because of the All Volunteer Army we don't have to work on Saturdays. Beer is now allowed in the barracks, and giant rooms of 50 men have been cut down to more private rooms of three men," he said.

WARD, BOLTEN, and Hollenbeck all agree that if a major confrontation should break out the All Volunteer Army would not be able to do the job and that there would have to be some type of draft.

The Sgt. Major feels that eventually we will have to go back to the draft, even in peace time.

"The quality of the Army as a fighting force will drop to a point where the people of America will want the draft," he said. "After all, that is what you and I as taxpayers are paying for, a high-quality fighting force."

Maintenance truck damaged in fire

A K-State Physical Plant welding truck caught fire at about 3:15 p.m. Monday in the Waters Hall parking lot. There were no injuries, but the truck was severely damaged.

The driver, Sheldon Rutherford, a Physical Plant worker, said he had been working on a welding job in the parking lot. He decided to move the truck when he noticed the fire.

Sheldon said he was driving the truck in the parking lot when his neck began to get warm. He saw the flames in the back of the truck, rolled it out of the vicinity of other cars and jumped out.

He had no idea what started the fire, but by the time the fire was extinguished, the welding machine had been badly burned and at least one propane tank had exploded.

City plans review of criminal code

A review of the city criminal code will begin at tonight's Manhattan City Commission meeting.

The codes cover such criminal actions as person and property offenses, moral and decency complaints, curfews, and peace and order disruptions.

Manhattan City Attorney Ed Horne said the review is normal practice and used to determine whether a code is outdated or needs rewording. "Codes can get outdated," Horne said, "and we want to determine what is useful and what is not."

Horne said a re-codification of the codes is expected within the year and the board wanted to start the review as soon as possible.

The commission last reviewed the codes in 1973.

Japanese children to participate in American culture exchange

Many Japanese children will get first-hand experience of American family life this summer.

The children are members of LABO, an International Exchange Foundation approved by the Japanese Ministry of Affairs in May, 1973. Prior to the program, the organization was sponsored by the LABO Information Teaching Center, an organization of Japanese women who taught English in their homes to neighborhood children.

The directors of LABO decided to take the learning experience one step further and begin the exchange program.

The first exchange program with Japan was initiated in 1972 by the state 4-H offices of Washington and Idaho.

"The prime purpose for the program became not one of language learning but of a cultural understanding between two different cultures," Yoshio Ishikawa, director general of LABO, Tokyo, said.

ISHIKAWA said the program "is a good chance for the children to find out who they are, where they come from and what the Japanese language is."

ages 12 through 16 years, will arrive in 15 Kansas counties to start their American experience.

Each child will have an American host family which they will stay with for the entire three-week period. The families are urged not to change their normal routines because LABO wants the children to get the real picture of American family life.

BOLINGBROOK, Ill.—A banker's daughter was abducted at gunpoint in Manhattan, Kan., and raped by a man who released her near a southwestern suburb of Chicago, state police said Monday.

A spokesman for the FBI said the agency was investigating whether federal kidnapping laws were violated.

The woman said a man, about 27, hid in the rear seat of her car when she entered a grocery store in Manhattan about 11 p.m. Saturday, authorities said.

She said she was taken at gunpoint in Manhattan and raped. She was then forced back into her auto and the two drove all night to Chicago.

The man told the woman he planned to meet a friend in the Chicago area and the continue to Detroit. He slowed or stopped the car near Bolingbrook and let the woman out, said Jay Eichholzer, Illinois state trooper.

The identity of the woman or her parents was not revealed.

CLEARWATER, Kan.—Gov. Robert Bennett lashed out at the Carter administration's policy toward wheat farmers Monday, terming it "indecisive" and "stupid" during a tour of the 1977 Kansas wheat harvest.

The Republican governor was sharply critical of an Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service decision lowering the average loan rate on wheat.

"I think it sort of typifies the indecision and stupidity of the current administration that went running around during election time and talked about what they were going to for the wheat farmer," he said, "and then ultimately forgot about them now that election time is over and they have other pressures with which to contend."

MEXICO CITY—Ten Americans imprisoned in Cuba on drug charges have been freed and flown here for repatriation to the United States, U.S. officials said Monday.

The release of 10 of the estimated 30 Americans in Cuban jails was seen as a goodwill gesture by President Fidel Castro to help improve relations between the two countries.

When it was announced June 3 that Washington and Havana would establish lower-level diplomatic ties for the first time in 16 years, the Castro government said it would release 10 American prisoners. But the State Department said then the release "was not part of the deal."

Earlier Monday, President Carter told a news conference there was "no immediate prospect" the United States would agree to restore full diplomatic relations, including an exchange of ambassadors.

TOPEKA—Hot, dry winds are ripening Kansas' 1977 wheat crop much more rapidly than last year's crop ripened, the state Crop and Livestock Reporting Service said Monday.

As of last Saturday, the weekly summary of crop conditions said, about 15 per cent of the state's 12 million acres of wheat expected to be harvested had ripened. The service called that "well ahead of the normal maturity."

In addition, about 75 per cent of the state's wheat had reached the turning stage, well ahead of the 1976 crop which by this time had only 50 per cent reaching the turning stage.

The long-time average is for 60 per cent of the crop to begin turning by now.

The service said about five per cent of the wheat had been cut in the south-central and southeast districts by last weekend, with considerable test-cutting of fields going on all over the state.

Ray keeps quiet about prison escape

BRUSHY MOUNTAIN, Tenn. (AP)—James Earl Ray, looking "like a pig wallowing in a sty" when he was captured after two days of freedom in water-logged, snake-infested woods, was placed in an isolation cell Monday, doggedly silent about his daring flight from prison.

A disciplinary hearing and possible state escape charges held no terror for the convicted assassin of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. The worst he could get is a loss of "good time" from his 99-year sentence which bars parole for 33 years after sentencing.

With the re-taking of Ray and two other fugitives in a 10-hour span, only one of the seven men who went over the prison's north wall Friday remained at large.

WARDEN Stonney Lane said it was only a matter of hours before Douglas Shelton would be captured—thus keeping intact Brushy Mountain Penitentiary's record of no successful escape.

When a sad-eyed bloodhound named Sandy sniffed out Ray from under a pile of leaves at 2 a.m., the escapee was "wet, muddy but not any muddier than the dog handlers," said Donald Daugherty, a canine trainer for the prison.

Ray was flushed out only eight miles east of the prison but there was no telling how far he had walked and scrambled up steep hillsides in his 54½ hours outside the walls.

Lane, who took part in the search, said that Ray traveled with 35-year-old Earl Hill Jr., and Shelton and that they moved at a slow pace for short distances, mostly at night.

"You might get over the wall but you've got to get over a new wall—and that's the terrain," said Lane, a short slender man whose face mirrored his own exhaustion.

The re-taking of the state's most celebrated prisoner ended one of the largest manhunts in Tennessee's history, costing upward of $200,000—perhaps as much as a half million dollars.

Changes necessary in Medicaid funds

There is a good chance that Kansas' Medicaid allotment, withheld last week by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW), may arrive on schedule.

But that Kansas didn't meet requirements for its $1.89 million share of medicaid points out two things. First, the federal statutes on the distribution of Medicaid funds need to be changed. Second, the state's system for inspecting its nursing homes needs to be changed.

U.S. Representative Marth Keys (D-Kan.) said she was confident the funds would be released because only four nursing homes in Kansas weren't inspected on schedule and because Kansas made a "serious effort" to have its nursing homes inspected.

According to federal law, if only one nursing home in a state isn't inspected, that state receives no Medicaid funds. This puts the larger states which make serious efforts to get all their nursing homes inspected in peril because they would lose all Medicaid funds if only one home goes by uninspected.

That would, and will if the law isn't changed, wipe out several state's health care programs for the elderly.

HEW SECRETARY Joseph Califano is hoping to arrange it so that states would get money for the nursing homes inspected, but those homes not inspected would receive nothing—creating a desire for all nursing homes to demand they be inspected.

Kansas, then, would not lose its $1.89 million Medicaid allotment, but only a fraction representing the four Western Kansas nursing homes which weren't inspected.

Without the needed $1.89 million, nursing home care in Kansas would be sharply reduced to a substandard level, but the cut last week may be enough for the state to reevaluate its inspection system, ultimately upgrading Kansas nursing homes.

HEW's decision last week was just what states like Kansas, with large nursing home operations, needed. They were made to realize that they were taking the huge Medicaid checks for granted, and most of them will now react by improving their nursing home inspection programs.

Arms sales or human rights

President Carter's high-minded rhetoric during the campaign about cutting down the amount of arms the U.S. sells abroad was listened to gratefully by pacifists and persons who consider the sale of arms an open invitation to make war.

Tying into his desire to cut down arms sales, Carter pledged to wage a world-wide war against the common denial of human rights. Carter did not want those governments who suppressed their peoples to receive arms.

It sounds good. It looks good. And it appeals to the voters.

THEORETICALLY, the issue stands without debate. We, being freedom-loving Americans, do not want to see other peoples denied freedom.

Realistically, it doesn't seem to be working for Carter and his foreign policy brigade.

The amount of arms we are selling to other countries has not been substantially reduced. The rhetoric of human rights is remaining pure rhetoric.

An examination of Carter's record will show he has cut off sales to some countries whose governments are not allowing its people basic human rights, countries such as Ethiopia and Uruguay.

But Carter is being very selective. He is ignoring those countries who have "strategic importance" and although they may be of some of the most severe violators of human rights, they are still receiving arms.

A PRIME example is Iran. Iran is an ally. They have not behaved in a war-mongering fashion toward Israel, therefore they are our friends. They also supply us with that vital resource we have come to rely on so heavily...oil. And so, we ignore the fact that the government of Iran is probably the worst violator of basic human rights in the Middle East.

Political prisoners in Iran, whether they have spoken out against the government or looked sideways at a government official, are tortured. They are subjected to forms of torture unimagined during the dimmest days of the Dark Ages.

The Iranian government also employs spys in the U.S. to watch and report on Iranian students studying here, just to make sure the students are not getting any bright ideas about freedom of speech or are not subverting the government back home.

Yet, when it comes time to sell arms, Carter sits down, never mentioning the violation of human rights in the country, and delightfully sells Iran some of our most sophisticated weaponry.

We shouldn't only cite Iran.

KOREA, one of our most powerful allies in Asia, is just as guilty of violating human rights. The freedom of speech is little known. If it exists, it is not widely practiced.

The U.S. may be pulling ground forces from Korea, but we can remain assured the country will continue to receive U.S. arms and military supplies.

Hypocritical? Yes. There is no other word for it. Secretary of State Vance has admitted the policy is hypocritical, but he and Carter have not suggested an alternative, nor have they applied much pressure to the governments of these countries.

So, which policy are we going to follow, the support of human rights or the profitable sale of arms? It's obvious from what we have already seen that it is not going to work if both policies are implemented simultaneously.

Doctor's plan is no solution

The American Medical Association (AMA) has sponsored an alternative to Sen. Ed Kennedy's National Health Care Plan, but putting the two side-by-side, it's not all that impressive.

The need is for a health care plan which will combat, not fuel, soaring medical costs. The AMA bill, according to that organization's president, Richard Palmer, would "minimize federal intervention, thereby encouraging the responsiveness and innovativeness of the private sector."

It is a lack of federal involvement in health care which has allowed many doctors to be not only innovative but imaginative as well. The problem of gouging the patient, performing unnecessary operations, or not performing operations at all and billing health insurance companies can certainly be considered "innovative."

Doctor fees and hospital costs have risen twice the rate of the cost of living in the past two years, an average hospital room costs about $175 per day and health costs take one dollar out of every nine earned by the average worker each year. Even after being reimbursed by health insurance companies, one out of every 11 Americans will pay 15 per cent of their total income in medical costs.

What this leads to is a warped and dangerous way of looking at illness.

Few Americans can afford to have a routine checkup and most of the visits to the doctor today are not to see if anything is wrong but because something is already wrong. It's not preventive medicine anymore, it's crisis-orientated medicine and it's more expensive.

When one of the largest and wealthiest lobbying groups in Washington writes a bill to put an end to all this it should be looked on with a careful eye.

The bill would keep the employed 90 per cent of the country covered as they are now, through health insurance companies. The unemployed would receive federal support. There is virtually no change in the coverage to lower-middle income families who would still be covered by employee-employer health plans but also vulnerable to high medical costs. Ultimately, Palmer says, the AMA version would rely on the private sector for change and improvement to get "a tighter grip on costs."

Why the private sector would control costs in the future when it hasn't in the past Palmer doesn't explain.

Kennedy's version of a comprehensive health care plan covers all Americans who want it. Unfortunately, the title, "National Health Care Plan" reeks to many as socialism. Put a national... in front of any federal program and you're in trouble.

It's more a matter of semantics than anything else.

Kennedy's plan would come with increased income taxes, but not an increase of more than $600 per year on the average, which is, on the average, more than what most Americans pay in medical costs.

It would eliminate, for those wishing to participate, medical bills. A token cost of about $5 would be charged for a pair of glasses, for example.

More importantly it would bring those who reluctantly stay away from doctors' offices, because of high costs, in more often and give new life to the idea of preventive medicine.

Korea still faces danger

Editor:

Ken Miller's editorial on Korea proves that ignorance is bliss. All is NOT well in the "Land of the Morning Calm."

Having recently served a tour in Korea for Uncle Sam, I feel somewhat qualified to speak on the subject.

North Korea has refused to sign a peace treaty between herself and the U.N. Command. The cease-fire agreement signed in 1953 expired in 1975, and to my knowledge, has not been replaced. During the past four years, North Korea has nearly doubled her forces along the border; which are posed in a strictly offensive manner.

THE TUNNEL Steven Yee mentioned in his letter on June 13 is only one of several found each year. During my tour in 1975, a tunnel was found equipped with railroad tracks, not to be mistaken for a miner's dolly track.

Several U.N. personnel, including Americans, were killed by a Chinese Claymore mine while exploring this tunnel. This was in February, I believe. While home on leave in May, I read of the tunnel in the newspaper.

The article said the tunnel was "recently discovered" and no mention was made of the lives lost. Americans have not been made aware of the fairly common fire-fights across the border and of our observation aircraft being shot down. The situation is far from stable. In fact, during our final days in Vietnam, Kim Il Sung and the entire general staff went to Peking to ask Mao's permission to invade the South.

AS TO the South's ability to defend herself, I should like to say that the ROK Army is well-trained and determined.

However, they are sorely outgunned by the North. We have been less kind, in military aid, to South Korea than to other countries. We've been giving them outdated surplus items, as opposed to the North's modern Chinese weaponry.

Our presence in Korea can and does mean the difference between relative peace and total war. If we need to bring troops home, they should come from Europe where the situation is more stable. Even if it wasn't we don't have enough troops in Europe to make a difference one way or the other. Could it be that the Europeans deserve the protection, but the Orientals don't? Think about it.

Clever wit for bored readers

Editor:

You and your news staff are to be commended on a fine job of keeping the campus community up to date on current affairs with articles, features, and editorials of interest. I am the type of reader who reads the paper from front to back (including the ads).

I realize there are slow days when news is hard to find and something is needed to fill the gaps. Therefore, I would like to submit some tidbits of humor that you are free to use as fillers, or whatever.

Question: Why does a hummingbird hum?

Answer: Because it doesn't know the words!

Question: What do you get when you cross a hummingbird with a doorbell?

Answer: A humdinger!

Question: Why did the jerk take his ladder to the party?

Answer: Because he heard the drinks were on the house!

These types of jokes could even be incorporated into some news stories for a touch of humor. I heard some of these gems on T.V.'s Gong Show and would suggest your reporting students tune in over the lunch hour if they would like to hear some more.

ARE YOU SURE YOU KNOW WHAT FAMILY PLANNING IS ALL ABOUT?

If you think it means preventing unwanted pregnancies... you are partially right. The right time for children and a family is when you are ready to be parents and not before. An unplanned pregnancy could mess up your educational plans... your job... your life.

But family planning means a lot more. Like:

- counseling young people about their problems and the effect that a baby may have on their health and future
- protecting the health of mother and baby
- counseling men on male responsibility and methods of birth control
- helping couples who want to have children but can't

It's important to know ALL about family planning... it means more than you may have thought.

For more information, call the family planning clinic in your community, your local health department, or your own physician.

90 year-old Kansan reflects on past

By DIXIE HOLMES
Collegian Reporter

Grandpa smiled. People don't ask much anymore what it was like when he was growing up—yet he has so much to tell.

Herbert "Grandpa" Coffin, 90, the oldest native son of Scott County, now resides east of Manhattan. His parents homesteaded Scott County in the 1800s when Scott City was getting started. Coffin founded the H.A. Coffin Museum there in 1948.

A former hunter, rancher, track star, movie projectionist, deputy game warden and museum founder, he has done and seen a lot in his lifetime.

HE CONSIDERS hunting his greatest achievement. Grandpa remembers shooting 175 ducks in one evening in the 1890s when there were no limits or seasons.

"Dad used to sell the ducks to the railroad dining car when it came through town," Coffin said. "One day we took down 500 ducks and I got $16 for them. Dad was so proud he bragged it up in town so the other hunters caught on and started doing it too."

He laughed but became serious again as he added, "I don't like to tell about these things anymore. People just don't believe it."

Once he and a friend went out

It was in the 1920s and 1930s that Coffin became seriously interested in Indian history and artifacts.

Much of his knowledge of the Plains Indians comes from direct experience. He remembers when the Indians used to burn the plains every year and the sky would have "an orange glow." This practice allowed the fields to green more quickly and hastened the return of the buffalo.

"When I talked to (elementary and high school) classes, I used to arrowhead collection, he displayed an actual photograph of Abe Lincoln, a Civil War medicine chest belonging to his grandfather and a "picture show machine."

"People told me they liked my museum so much because a story went with everything," Coffin said.

For example, his "picture show machine" was the first of its kind in western Kansas. Called a "flicker-flash" movie projector, its front shutter caused the picture to jump around.

"I understood them (the machines) pretty good so I used to help other people install theirs," Coffin said. "I was a projectionist for the picture show man for 51 years, too."

"Grandpa" was lost for a moment in the memory. Looking through the window across the yard, his eyes saw something no one else could see. But he didn't dwell there long.

His present, he believes, is as important as the past.

"I've done everything. There isn't anything I can't do."

"I used to tell the kids that the Indians were the smartest people that ever lived... Teachers didn't always like that."

and shot over 500 jackrabbits in one day with 12-gauge shot guns. But, according to Coffin, you didn't always need a gun to catch a rabbit.

"When we were teenage kids, a stunt we'd like to do was to scare out an old jackrabbit and run him down." His eyes twinkled through the lenses of his glasses.

"Mind you, it had to be an old jackrabbit, but you could do it. It would take maybe five to seven miles of steady jogging but eventually the rabbit would tire and the first hole he came to, no matter how shallow, he'd jump in and wait. You'd just reach in and grab him."

CHASING rabbits proved to be good training for Coffin. While running for Bethany College's track team in 1908, Coffin said he was co-holder of the state record in the mile relay and held the state record in the 100-yard dash.

tell the kids that the Indians were the smartest people that ever lived," Coffin said. "They knew everything on this earth and what it was for. Teachers didn't always like that."

COFFIN said he is disgusted with much of the Indian history he reads today. He calls it "fictitious modern stuff."

"The Indians got the best of so many battles, but the government's men didn't write it that way," he said bitterly, as though the injustice done to the Indians was a personal injustice, too.

The H.A. Coffin Museum, listed in the guide of "Museums of S.W. Kansas" was run by Coffin for 19 years. He personally conducted all tours until he was "too old for that" and sold the museum in 1967.

Aggieville acquires new private club

Remodeling and expansion are nearly completed for Gily's Landing, a new private club in Aggieville.

The club will be located at the former Gily's Seafood Restaurant which has been closed since April.

When the changes are completed, Gily's Landing will feature a multi-level floor with a large area for disco dancing and an increase in floor space from 3,000 to 5,500 square feet, said John Gilman, brother of Gily's owner and manager Sam Gilman.

Seating capacity will be around 350.

According to John Gilman, he and his brother wanted to make Gily's a private club when it was first purchased three years ago, but they ran into problems obtaining a class "A" license.

LICENSING procedures were recently changed to do away with class "A" licenses, making them all class B. The only difference between the two, John Gilman explained, is the 10-day waiting period for private club membership.

"One of the main difficulties in the switch from restaurant to club," John Gilman said, "is in getting the building permit. Some of the building codes added considerably to the cost of the project."

The cost of remodeling totals about $110,000, Sam Gilman said.

Gily's Landing "will appeal to anyone who wants to try something new," John Gilman said. He believes Gily's Landing will have a "broad based appeal."

"We hope to hit a happy medium between the college students and the older crowd," he said.

Sam Gilman said the brothers borrowed their food ideas from some Kansas City restaurants.

"The menu will feature such specialty items as crepes, omelets and quiches as well as steak," John Gilman said.

No definite opening date has been set for Gily's Landing, but John Gilman said it will probably be in the middle of July.

Coeds becoming more career-oriented

By BARBARA RUST
Collegian

Women entering college for the first time are becoming more career-oriented, according to a survey conducted by Margaret Nordin, associate director of the Center for Student Development.

The survey, completed in 1976, showed K-State freshmen women are following a national trend with more than half of them desiring a career over marriage. In a 1973 survey, Nordin said less than half of the freshmen women wanted a career.

In a most recent survey, 27 per cent of the career-oriented women ranked a career as top priority and security second.

"This indicates these women will rely on security from their own means and not their husbands," Nordin said.

THIRTY-FIVE per cent of the women who didn't desire a career ranked marriage first and security second.

"These women might rely on security from a husband as opposed to their own ability," Nordin said.

Forty-four per cent of the women wanted marriage, career and children. Twenty nine per cent wanted to be housewives with one or more children and 22 per cent desired marriage, career and no children.

This contrasts with the freshmen women's survey of 1973 in which 53 per cent wanted marriage, career and children, but 37 per cent wanted to be a housewife with one or more children. Also, in 1973, only eight per cent desired marriage, career and no children.

SEVERAL QUESTIONS were asked concerning women's issues such as equal pay for equal work, draft for women and equal freedom for both sexes. In these areas, the women of 1976 were more conservative than in 1973, Nordin said. Less than half the women in 1976 agreed with the goals of the women's movement, but 60 per cent agreed in 1973, she said.

"There is much misinformation regarding salaries of working men and women who are college graduates," Nordin said. "Much work needs to be done to help students become more knowledgeable about the world of work and to realize the implications in their own lives," Nordin added.

Career choices are not as traditional as in the past, Nordin said. According to her survey, the top career choice is the home economics profession (127 per cent). The second choice is education (12 per cent) but law and medicine are ranked third with 10 per cent.

NORDIN BELIEVES the increase in women's career goals is due to the U.S. economic situation.

"A study taken five years from now would find women more independent and confident," she said. "As a result, children of these women will be confident, self-sufficient and more open in terms of communicating about people or their own feelings."

In the fall semester of 1973 and 1976, questionnaires were given to residence hall staffs to distribute voluntarily to freshmen women. Ford and West halls were used in 1973 and Goodnow Hall, a coed dorm, was added in 1976.

"The questionnaire measured freshmen women's attitudes and reactions to several general topics, such as their plans for career, marriage, educational and long-term goals and the women's movement," Nordin said.

"In 1976, we received 340 responses, or 18 per cent of the freshmen women enrolled and in 1973 we received 248 responses, 17 per cent of the freshmen women," she said. "We believe this is a representative sample."

"The results will guide us in our programming efforts and will help us pinpoint areas of interest and concern to women students," Nordin said. "The findings will be used in program planning at residence halls, the Career Planning and Placement Center and Women's Resource Center."

"The New Chuck Colson," a film describing what really happened to the White House Hatchet Man will be shown at Forum Hall, KSU Union on Wednesday, June 15 at 7:00.

Charles W. Colson, described by TIME Magazine as "Tough, wily, nasty and tenaciously loyal to Richard Nixon," at the peak of a brilliant law career became one of the President's closest confidants.

In December of 1973, in the middle of the Watergate Scandal, the headline "Colson Makes Decision for Christ" jarred Washington. Many people suspected a gimmick, while most who knew him as "Nixon's Hatchet Man" just laughed.

Then came his surprising plea of "guilty" followed by long months in federal prison. It soon became apparent that something real had happened to Chuck Colson. The cool calculating "Tough Guy" was different.

The film makes no attempt to stage or dramatize events nor does it attempt to justify what happened. In a straightforward manner it describes what made Charles W. Colson a new man.

Providing first-hand experience

Program explores design

By DIANE GONZOLAS
Collegian Reporter

"What's wrong with the parking lot?"

"Is our sun working?"

Thirteen high school students were crowded around a cardboard landscape resting on two drawing tables. Their chatter was constant.

The design problem the students were working on is part of the Design Discovery Program which began June 5 and will continue until Friday. The program is sponsored by the College of Architecture and Design and by the Division of Continuing Education. "The idea is to introduce students to possible careers in the design and planning of buildings and their surroundings, towns and cities," said Ifan Paune, head of the Department of Pre-Design Professions at K-State.

"This is the only program of its kind in the midwest, as far as we can determine," Eugene Kremer, head of the Department of Architecture, said.

THE 13 HIGH school students from Kansas and Missouri who are taking part in the program were "selected on the basis of academic record and interest," Kremer said. Students can receive two hours of college credit for the session.

The design problem will give the students "first-hand experience in doing design work," Frank Locker, instructor of architecture and one of the directors of the program, said.

The project involves building design and the general layout for a residential lakefront area. The students also are building a model of their plans.

"It's really the same kind of problem they would get into in college," Locker said.

Matt Doty, a participant from Garnett, said "I've learned a lot of things I've never thought about before. I learned how much a model helps out."

ALSO INCLUDED in the discovery program are presentations on different areas of environmental design such as interior and landscape architecture and regional and community planning.

Locker said that "non-traditional ways of pursuing design" will be discussed as well as career opportunities in the design profession.

Through expeditions in Manhattan and a trip to Kansas City, the students have been able to explore many buildings such as a turn-of-the-century office building, a high-rise under construction and a solar home.

They have also had the opportunity to visit with many practicing architects. This experience left an impression on Joel Galbraith, a senior from Wathena.

"It seems like it's hard to get exactly what people want," he said.

JOHN MEYER, a senior at Rock Bridge High School in Columbia, Mo., admitted he was a little skeptical of the program at first. Meyer, who plans to major in environmental design at Oklahoma University, said he was having doubts about whether or not he would learn anything, but his doubts have disappeared.

Besides being together all day, the participants are also staying on the same floor in Haymaker Hall. They believe the closeness of the group has added to the program.

The Design Discovery Program will end Friday with a review of the design project by the faculty. The parents and guidance counselors of the participants are expected to attend.

K-State signs new pitcher, sprinters

Last week was a fruitful recruiting week for K-State coaches Phil Wilson and Mike Ross.

Wilson, head baseball coach, announced the signing of Mark Harrison, a pitcher from Kansas City, Kansas, Community Junior College.

Harrison, a 6'5", 210-pound righthander, compiled a 15-7 won-lost record and a 1.84 ERA during his two juno seasons. He struck out 179 batters and walked only 48 in 159 innings pitched.

Head track coach Ross announced the signing of two sprinters in an effort to strengthen his sprinting corps.

Ray Hanf, a 47.7 second quarter-miler from Kansas City, Kansas, Junior College, and Bill Turner, a 47.9 second quarter-miler from Eagle Grove, Iowa, have signed letters of intent.

House rejects move to slash water projects

WASHINGTON (AP)—The House, ignoring President Carter's wishes, rejected a move Tuesday to slash 16 water projects from the $10.2-billion public works appropriations bill. But the vote against the amendment was 218 to 194, which was a strong showing in defeat for the Carter forces.

The vote cast doubt on whether the water projects' supporters in the House could muster a two-thirds majority to override a presidential veto on the bill.

Carter has said he might veto the bill if funds for the projects are left intact. He contends the projects are not worth their cost in money and environmental damage.

BACKERS of the amendment said they did not expect to win, but that if they could secure a one-third vote, it would assure that the President would veto any bill with money for the projects.

Republican whip Robert Michel of Illinois predicted that with a close vote, "there is no way Carter could back off" from his veto threat.

The vote followed a three-hour debate in which Majority Leader Jim Wright, D-Texas, was among those supporting the disputed projects.

Wright said he was embarrassed to be opposing the administration-backed amendment, but believed Carter was receiving poor advice.

"Many of these projects are almost finished and others are under way," he told the House.

"I don't think it is sound economy to stop progress now and throw this money away."

BUT A CRITIC, Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., said, "many of the projects are in fact dinosaurs of a by-gone era."

The defeated amendment would have slashed $169.7 million for 16 projects opposed by Carter.

Rep. Silvio Conte, R-Mass., chief sponsor of the amendment, acknowledged before the debate that he did not anticipate winning, but "if it gets 145 or 146 votes, we will have enough to sustain a veto."

A co-sponsor of the amendment was Rep. Butler Derrick, D-S.C., whose congressional district includes the Richard B. Russell Dam, one of the projects they proposed to eliminate.

Some officers accused of sleeping

Security and traffic probe continues

By KAY COLES
Editor

The investigation into allegations that officers in the K-State Security and Traffic office have conducted themselves in an "unprofessional manner" is continuing with a preliminary report due this week.

According to the officer who made the charges against other officers, the "unprofessional" conduct allegedly involves sleeping on the job.

THE OFFICER, who asked not to be identified, said he was reprimanded for sleeping on the job, given a letter of dismissal, then decided to resign, claiming that all of the officers in the department have at one time or another slept on the job.

"The people on the shift I was on (midnight to 8 a.m.), the people I worked with, have been doing the same thing for two years," the officer said.

"The guy with me (the night he was caught sleeping) was also sound asleep," he said.

"Paul Nelson (director of the Security and Traffic office) stated that if there were two in the car, one could doze," the officer said. "They actually know what's going on and don't do anything."

"It upsets me that one man, caught once or twice sleeping is dismissed and all the others are still on the job," the officer said. "Another man who was caught sleeping was ordered to take eight hours without pay, but he refused and he is still working."

"I'm certainly glad that something's (the investigation) being done," he said. "But I don't think the investigation is going as far as it should."

THE OFFICER did not elaborate on what other areas the committee should investigate.

"It's a mess," he said. "It (security and traffic office) could be run a lot differently," he said.

Paul Young, vice president for university development, who called for the investigation, would not comment on the charges.

"I don't have any report," he said. Nelson also refused to comment on the charges, stating, "There's no point in asking me questions, wait and talk to the committee."

Croatian terrorists surrender following UN shooting incident

NEW YORK (AP)—Three Croatian terrorists shot down a security guard at the Yugoslav Mission to the United Nations on Tuesday, then barricaded themselves in a third-floor room for about two hours before surrendering to police.

The gunmen, who had claimed they were ready to die for their cause of Croatian independence from Communist Yugoslavia, surrendered peacefully following negotiations over the telephone with police department hostage experts.

An early police report that the trio held a woman hostage proved unfounded, officers said. "We tried to tell them that they had made their point and they should get out before they hurt anyone else," said Chief of Detectives John Keenan.

"One of them, I guess you could say, was sensible and he finally told the others to give up."

THE GUNMEN strolled past the New York police officer on guard duty outside the Fifth Avenue townhouse overlooking Central Park. The officer, John Gavin, said he did not stop them because they were well-dressed and his function is to provide security outside the mission.

Gavin said he heard a shot in the lobby and turned to see one of the men over the wounded guard, identified as Radomir Medic, 58. Gavin said he pursued the men upstairs and that one of them told him through a closed door: "I want publicity! I want the cameras here!"

Gavin, thinking the trio had taken a woman hostage, offered to change places with her but the offer was refused.

Medic suffered a wound in the abdomen. The security guard, who also acts as a chauffeur for the mission, was reported in serious condition at Lenox Hill Hospital.

THE TERRORISTS draped a flag out the window and threw down leaflets demanding freedom for Croatia.

At the climax of the tense events, as the gunmen were being removed from the mission by policemen, there was renewed drama.

Another Yugoslav security guard suddenly displayed a machine gun, scattering police, who drew their own guns and shouted: "Get out of the way!"

At the same time, one of the Yugoslavs inside the mission shouted, "Kill them now! They won't get justice!"

Police Officer John Varonecnyk said, "They wanted to kill them right there, right on the spot."

CROATIA is one of six Balkan regions united after World War II to create Yugoslavia. Only Serbia has a larger population.

Joseph Medjugorac, employed by a Bronx storage firm, was making a delivery at a building on East 66th Street at Fifth Avenue when the gunman raided the mission.

"When we come up here, we heard the shot around the corner. We looked out there, and there was a man holding a gun out of the window of the second floor," he said.

Vance renounces use of officially sanctioned violence

ST. GEORGE'S, Grenada (AP)—Secretary of State Cyrus Vance told Latin American foreign ministers Tuesday that governments descend into "the nether world of the terrorist" when they violate human rights in the name of fighting terrorism.

Vance, speaking at a meeting of the General Assembly of the Organization of American States (OAS) on this Caribbean island, told his Latin American counterparts their countries must take action to improve the freedom of every citizen in the hemisphere.

Vance spoke in direct response to addresses by the foreign ministers of Chile and Argentina, whose governments have been accused of human rights violations, including political imprisonment and torture.

Some conservative Latin American regimes, including those of Argentina, Chile and Brazil, have reacted negatively to President Carter's human rights campaign.

FOREIGN Minister Oscar Montes of Argentina told the ministers that the problem of terrorism must be considered in any discussion of human rights.

Chile's foreign minister, Patricio Carvajal, said, "The real cause of supposed repression of human rights is not poverty or economic hardship but subversion and terrorism sponsored by the Soviet Union. Problems of human rights and terrorism must be dealt with as one."

Vance said, "If terrorism and violence in the name of dissent cannot be condoned, neither can violence that is officially sanctioned. Such action perverts the legal system that alone assures the survival of our traditions."

"The surest way to defeat terrorism is to promote justice in our societies - legal, economic and social justice. Justice that is summary undermines the future it seeks to promote. It produces only more violence, more victims and more terrorism."

Vance pledged continued bilateral and multilateral aid for the development of poor and middle-income countries, but declared, "Our cooperation in economic development must not be mocked by consistent patterns of gross violation of human rights."

WASHINGTON—A House panel has voted to give 20 states threatened with loss of $142 million in Medicaid payments a six-month extension to comply with federal requirements on reviewing nursing homes that house Medicaid clients.

The extension, until Jan. 1, 1978, was approved on Monday by the House commerce health and environment subcommittee.

Health, Education and Welfare Secretary Joseph Califano Jr., said last week that the law would force him to withhold payments due the states on July 1. But he called on Congress to change the law to set new guidelines and to permit the states to get the aid.

KANSAS CITY—A pastor representing Korean Baptists asked the Southern Baptist Convention Tuesday to "do everything you can to prevent this American pullout and the war in Korea that would follow."

The plea by Timothy Chou of Seoul referred to President Jimmy Carter's decision to pull American ground troops out of Korea.

"There are 2,000 Communist tanks poised along the 150-mile long demilitarized zone and they could be in South Korea in three minutes," Chou declared.

"Forgive us if we have failed you," he said. "Please pray for us."

BRUSHY MOUNTAIN, Tenn.—The most extensive manhunt in Tennessee history ended in triumph Tuesday when the same dog handler who ran down James Earl Ray caught the last of six inmates who fled Brushy Mountain Penitentiary with Ray five days before.

Douglas Shelton, 32, was recaptured about 9 a.m. by guard Sammy Joe Chapman. Shelton, Ray and Ray's cellmate, Earl Hill Jr., are believed by prison officials to have planned the breakout.

KANSAS CITY—A large quantity of pesticides, stolen over the weekend from an exterminating company, could spell disaster if found by children or unsuspecting adults, a federal official said Tuesday.

John Wicklund, director of the Environmental Protection Agency, said two of the chemicals stolen from the Getz Exterminating Company pose an extreme danger if found by persons not familiar with them.

Wicklund said one of the chemicals, phostoxin pellets, are in a canister and form an extremely dangerous gas lethal to humans in very small doses when exposed to air.

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo.—The Missouri Supreme Court ruled Tuesday that a bullet removed from the buttocks of a man convicted of murder violated his constitutional protection against unreasonable search.

While the court unanimously ordered a new trial for Tommie Overstreet, it declined, on a 5-2 vote, to hold that all efforts to surgically remove evidence from criminal suspects automatically is a violation of constitutional rights.

Overstreet was convicted of the murder of Louis Adelstein during the January 1974 robbery of the Straight Way Iron and Metal Co. in St. Louis only after a circuit court judge ordered that surgeons remove a bullet from his buttocks.

Expert testimony at the trial, however, showed that the bullet taken from Overstreet's buttocks under the court order was fired from Adelstein's gun.

KNEA opposes teacher's dismissal

TOPEKA (AP)—The president of the Kansas National Education Association says the 22,000-member organization vigorously opposes the transfer of a Fort Scott journalism teacher involved in a squabble over a student editorial.

Dennis Doris called the transfer a "mockery of democratic ideals and represents a learning experience of the worst kind."

The incident involved Lily Kober, a journalism advisor at Fort Scott High School, who was reassigned after the editor of the Tiger Times, the student newspaper, wrote an editorial complaining of greasy tacos in the school cafeteria.

Principal William Weatherbie said the reassignment had nothing to do with the fact that his wife is a cook in the school cafeteria.

"Until the school system gives another reason, we can only assume that she was transferred because she allowed student editorial criticism in the student newspaper," Doris said.

"Students learn by their own experiences. For them to see their teacher transferred obviously for allowing criticism of tacos is a sad commentary on democracy and education."

Campus police should stay awake

Some officers of the Security and Traffic Office have been accused of sleeping on the job, allegedly with the knowledge of their superiors.

It is unfortunate that men of their position with the responsibility of the students' safety have been sleeping on the job.

It is easy to see, however, why men who work eight-hour shifts on another job come to campus to work another eight hours and have a need for sleep. It is easy to understand that a man in a car would find it relaxing when there is little activity on campus.

Understandable, yes. Forgivable, no.

Assaults, thefts and rapes have occurred on this campus. Many have gone unreported to the press, due to "extenuating circumstances."

The majority of law-breaking incidents have occurred in the wee hours of the morning and it is not comforting to think our men from Security and Traffic have been sleeping during these hours of the night.

A suggestion which has been forwarded before is to have these men walking on campus.

An officer who is walking along the dimly-lit campus streets and sidewalks would be a greater deterrent to criminal acts. With a radio, help from car patrol officers would only be two minutes away.

Walking patrolmen could also be subject to laziness. They could stop in the library for a soda or sit and chat with students passing by on their way home or to the library.

But it would be comforting to at least have them in a position where they could not easily fall asleep. An officer of Security and Traffic would command more respect if he had an image of a hard-working, concerned patrolman than the one he now has as a ticket-writing, sleeping cop.

Racism knows no color

After racking my brain for some way to gain the attention of Andrew Young, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, I arrived at only one conclusion.

Although I am about as open-minded and interracial as they come, I am just going to have to pretend I'm a racist.

I guess the question at hand is the definition of the term itself. Let's be concrete about it; I'm certain you can relate.

A brown-skinned woman held her wrist to my face when I asked her the meaning of racism.

"Racism," she said, "is flesh-tone bandages. It implies all flesh is or should be white and that's ridiculous."

THE SAME woman said racism used to hit her in the face everyday in department store windows.

"All the dummies (mannequins) were white," she noted.

A half-breed (love those specifics) told me a woman whose skin is not "lily white" can't even dress well without being subconsciously labeled as a prostitute by white people.

"White people, especially the men, decide in their minds that you are for sale," she said.

Racism, a white man told me, is when whites get up to dance and blacks ridicule them.

"Never fails," he said. "I always feel blacks point and laugh at me whenever I dance."

"Racism is when you're in a dorm elevator with two blacks, your hands full of clothes, and one guy goes you while the other calls you a white bitch," a white woman said.

AN INTERRACIAL friend said racism is when she told her parents she was in love and the first question they asked was, "Is he black or white?"

You can't even get away from the issue on national television. NBC tried to be open-minded (or increase their viewing audience with controversial subject matter) by introducing an interracial couple on their soap opera "Days of Our Lives." Result? Hate mail and one viewer asking, "Surely they aren't going to let that nigger marry that white guy?"

I have to clear my throat on that one.

Americans, too, are well-known for their racist jokes. The blacks love it when George Jefferson talks about the "honkies" and the whites love it when Archie Bunker strikes back in true, white racist style.

You can "ride shotgun" or "ride nigger." You can be a wetback, dago, spic, redneck, jap, chink, kraut, etc.

THE SUBTLETIES of the mind... they go on ad infinitum. People can provide you with many so-called humorous examples of racism. The true picture, however, is not always so lovely. Breathtaking, perhaps, but not lovely.

And it is not always blacks who get the shoe-to-the-face treatment. Whites, too, have bitten the dust for many a black racist. The trouble is, I contend, that 90 per cent of racism consists of subtleties—off color remarks, old habits and traditional behavior.

We say or do things with little or no cognizance of the racism between the lines. And the people who see that fine print are those who are affected by it.

Young saw the fine print. True, he may have been looking for it, but God knows someone has to. He not only senses injustices done to his fellow black Americans, but also his fellow white, brown, yellow and red Americans.

BECAUSE he is black, however, the "Right on, brother" stigma seems to follow him and critics want to label him a militant black rights leader instead of the aggressive human rights leader he is.

Conservation begins at home

America is a wasteful society. We waste gasoline driving around the corner to the grocery store. We waste paper by only writing on one side. We waste toilet paper by stringing it in the bushes around houses on Halloween. We waste just about every product we use.

Some of the products we waste are in abundant supply. Many, such as natural resources, are becoming scarce.

We have been led to believe that our supplies of resources and everyday products are endless. The constant harangue of advertisers perpetuates this myth by encouraging us to use, use, use products, especially theirs.

It is time we stopped and looked at how we can conserve, not only diminishing natural resources, but all products we use.

Here are some helpful tips.

- When you write on a piece of paper, but haven't used it all, keep it. Then, when the urge to doodle or the need to take notes strikes, pull it out and use the rest of it. Don't throw paper away until you've used every inch of it.

- Half a cup of laundry detergent will do the same job a full cup will. The soap producers will not impart this information, they want you to use it up and buy more.

- Walk wherever possible. Get in the habit of leaving your car at home. We have become so dependant on our vehicles that they are almost like members of the family. Remember, walking is good for you and gasoline prices promise to soar.

- Squeeze your toothpaste tube from the bottom. I know this one is particularly difficult for me, so it might be for you, too. Squeezing from the bottom will enable you to use the whole tube so you don't have to throw it away when you know there's more there, but can't extract it because of the shape of the tube.

- Shower, don't bathe. Showers use one-third the water baths do. Better yet, shower with a friend!

- Turn your thermostat up to 80 degrees. You can live with it. Spoiled Americans can change their habits. We must change our habits before we deplete the entire world of necessary resources.

Some form of natural resources goes into almost every product we use. The more we use, the less we have. Unnecessary waste is something we should all strive to overcome.

Don't rely on the "other guy" to conserve. Rely on yourself.

Carter notches first energy victory

WASHINGTON (AP)—The House Ways and Means Committee handed President Carter a major victory Tuesday by approving a new oil tax aimed at forcing energy conservation by raising prices.

One effect of the tax would be to raise the price of gasoline by 7.6 cents a gallon by 1981.

The vote for a substitute crude-oil tax similar to the one offered by Carter was 21 to 16, with Republicans and oil-state Democrats opposing it.

HOWEVER, in three votes the committee made clear it does not favor turning over a share of the tax revenue to the oil industry as a production incentive.

The victory was the biggest yet for Carter since the Ways and Means Committee began considering his energy-tax program. He suffered three major defeats in the committee last week.

Some administration officials have viewed the crude-oil tax as a more important part of the Carter energy program than the standby gasoline tax and rebates for buyers of gas-efficient cars, which were defeated, and the tax on gas-guzzling cars, which was watered down by the committee.

THE CRUDE-OIL tax would take effect in three stages, starting in 1978. Eventually, the price of oil produced in the United States would be raised to the world price. U.S. production now ranges in price from $5.25 a barrel to $11.28. The world price averages about $13.50.

The Carter administration estimates the new tax would save up to 200,000 barrels of oil a day in 1980, rising to double that amount by 1985. Current use is about 17.4 million barrels a day.

Rather than give the tax back to taxpayers, the oil industry advocates turning over a share of the money to producers, in an effort to increase exploration for more oil. The committee defeated three attempts to earmark the money for producers.

Workshops feature relaxation techniques

The Center for Student Development is offering two programs dealing with stress and relaxation beginning this week.

Mini-workshops in "Coping with Stress" will be offered today from noon to 1 p.m. and from 7:30 p.m. to 9:30 p.m. in Union 212. The workshop will present a series of exercises in how to find stress in parts of the body and relax those parts.

Group Relaxation Training, to be June 20 through June 29 from 2:30 p.m. to 4:30 p.m. and June 20 through June 30 from 11:30 a.m. to 12:45 p.m., will involve practicing six different relaxation exercises and monitoring response with thermometers as feedback devices.

THERMOMETERS ARE taped to the middle finger of the dominant hand and the temperature is recorded before and after exercise. Hand temperature toes up as the person relaxes, Dave Danskin and Tim Lowenstein, coordinators, said.

As people in the programs become more experienced with biofeedback, they can go into training with instruments, the third phase of the programs, Danskin said.

Thermometers, an electromyograph (measuring muscle tension) and an electroencephalograph are used to measure the body's reaction to relaxation exercises.

Lab hours are Monday and Wednesday from 12:30 p.m. to 4:30 p.m. and Tuesday and Thursday from 8:30 a.m. to 12:30 p.m.

The programs are open to students, faculty, and staff at no charge.

Cromwell named Big Eight Athlete of the year

Nolan Cromwell, the gifted quarterback from the University of Kansas, has been named the 1977 Big Eight Conference Athlete-of-the-Year and will be honored at a dinner on Friday, June 24 at 7 p.m. at the Hilton Plaza Inn in Kansas City.

Bowie Kuhn, commissioner of professional baseball, will be the featured speaker at the affair.

Cromwell enters into an elite group of past winners such as Leroy Selmon, Thomas Rudd, Randy Hughes, Lucious Selmon, and Chris Taylor. Media representatives, athletic directors and members of the Sports Commission served on the panel responsible for selecting Cromwell.

DESPITE A crippling knee injury in the sixth game of the 1976 football season which ended his brilliant two-sport career at Kansas, Cromwell established himself as one of the outstanding figures in the school's and Big Eight's history.

Sports

Earning seven letters (four in football and three in track), he finished his career owning one NCAA football record, two school football records and four school track records.

A native of Ransom, Kan., Cromwell was the consensus leader for the All-American quarterback pick before his knee injury. Ironically, he began his career as a defensive back for the Jayhawks and was in the starting lineup during both his freshman and sophomore years. Kansas football coach Bud Moore decided Cromwell might make a good wishbone quarterback and the results of that experiment were surprising, even to Moore who insists Cromwell is the best wishbone quarterback to ever play the game.

"I've seen all the great ones," Moore said, "But there has never been one who could do all the things Nolan did. He's a winner in every respect."

Cromwell also excelled in track at Kansas and holds four school records: 440-yard intermediate hurdles, 400-meter intermediate hurdles, 600-yard run and the decathlon.

Cromwell is also an excellent student with just under a 3.0 grade-point-average in business which made him an academic all Big Eight choice this past season.

"I think of Nolan Cromwell as the ideal representation of what we term a student-athlete," Clyde Walker, director of Kansas athletics at Kansas said. In addition to being an excellent student and a very gifted athlete, he is also an outstanding citizen. He has handled his success admirably, devoting his spare time to causes that will benefit the community and the University."

Korbe says no to Reds; Prefers to stay at K-State

By DENNIS BOONE
Collegian Reporter

Opportunity knocked, wearing the baseball uniform of the Cincinnati Reds, but when Greg Korbe answered, he wasn't in a buying mood.

Korbe, a second-team All Big 8 selection last spring from Hays, was drafted in the 18th round of the professional baseball draft last week, but has bypassed the offer made by the Reds in favor of returning to K-State for his senior year.

Assistant athletic director accepts position at Ft. Hays

Phil Wilson, K-State assistant athletic director and baseball coach, has accepted the athletic director position at Fort Hays State University.

Gerald Tomanek, Fort Hays president, announced Wilson's appointment Tuesday.

Wilson, 30, was named K-State assistant athletic director in 1975. He has been the Wildcat baseball coach for the past five seasons.

Wilson's administrative duties have included fund raising and ticket sales promotion.

Wilson's Wildcat teams have compiled a 138-105 record. This makes Wilson the K-State baseball coach with the second highest number of victories.

"A scout for the Reds called me after I had been drafted," Korbe said. "But I thought it would be to my benefit to get one more year of education before turning pro."

Korbe, a junior in business, led the Wildcats in batting last season with a .406 average. The 6-1, 180-pound rightfielder knocked in 37 runs and drilled nine home runs during the spring campaign.

With those credentials, it comes as no great surprise that Coach Phil Wilson will be glad to see Korbe back in right field next spring.

"You bet I'm glad," Wilson said. "Greg has been an exceptional ball player, and you always like those kind to stay around."

"I was a little disappointed that Greg didn't go higher in the draft than he did, and I'm sure he was somewhat disappointed himself," said Wilson.

KORBE ALSO displayed a flair for defensive play in addition to his offensive output last season.

According to Wilson, Korbe played errorless ball in rightfield and threw out eight baserunners. Wilson says the only factor holding Korbe back was the fact he didn't run well, but that could be overcome.

"Greg is the type of player who improves when he plays every day," said Wilson. "This year, he proved his consistency. He didn't have more than one game at a time when he didn't get a hit."

Korbe, had he agreed to sign with the Reds, would first have been assigned to a preliminary camp in Billings, Mont. He would have then gone on to a Class A affiliate of the Cincinnati club, either Tampa, Fla., or Eugene, Ore.

Korbe had an earlier brush with a professional career when he was graduated from Thomas Moore Prep in Hays in 1974. At that time, he said, the Philadelphia Phillies offered him a pitcher's contract, which he turned down.

"For sure, I've wanted to play pro ball all my life," Korbe said. "I just felt that I could get at least the same offer next year, and I would have completed another year of college. That way, if I sign and get cut, I won't have a lot of school to finish to graduate."

Yankees beat KC

NEW YORK (AP)—Roy White drew a bases-loaded walk to force home the tie-breaking run in the eighth inning, and Lou Piniella singled home another as the New York Yankees beat the Kansas City Royals 4-2 Tuesday night behind Don Gullett's four-hitter.

Gullett posted his sixth straight triumph after dropping his first two starts, while loser Andy Hassler, 3-2, bowed to the Yankees for the sixth time in as many career decisions.

THE NEW CHUCK COLSON

motion picture

A Pat Booth production

"The New Chuck Colson" a film describing what really happened to the White House Hatchet Man will be shown at Forum Hall, KSU Union on Wednesday, June 15 at 7:00.

Charles W. Colson, described by TIME Magazine as "Tough, wily, nasty and tenaciously loyal to Richard Nixon," at the peak of a brilliant law career became one of the President's closest confidants.

In December of 1973, in the middle of the Watergate Scandal, the headline "Colson Makes Decision for Christ" jarred Washington. Many people suspected a gimmick, while most who knew him as "Nixon's Hatchet Man" just laughed.

Then came his surprising plea of "guilty" followed by long months in federal prison. It soon became apparent that something real had happened to Chuck Colson. The cool calculating "Tough Guy" was different.

The film makes no attempt to stage or dramatize events nor does it attempt to justify what happened. In a straightforward manner it describes what made Charles W. Colson a new man.

Non-residents face steeper tuition

By LISA CARMICHAEL
Staff Writer

Inflation has forced K-State to raise their tuition for all students. For Kansas residents this means paying an extra $66, but for out-of-state students, this means an extra $150, or a total of $840 as compared to $345 for residents.

K-State compares favorably with other Big Eight Schools in terms of tuition. According to the 1976 edition of Lovejoy's College Guide, K-State was the third most expensive Big Eight school, but has moved to fifth if the other schools do not raise their tuition.

Oklahoma University is the least expensive as far as out-of-state costs are concerned. Both Oklahoma State and Oklahoma charge $40 per credit hour for non-residents. This amounts to $640 for 16 hours.

THE UNIVERSITY of Nebraska charges $789 per semester and the University of Missouri charges $810 per semester for out-of-state students.

K-State is followed by Kansas, which charges $1,066 per semester for non-residents. Colorado is the most expensive of the Big Eight schools, charging $1,151 a semester for non-residents.

Iowa State University was not included in this survey because it is on the quarter system.

"It's (residency) for voting. You only have to be here for 30 days, but for students to get residency for tuition purposes, you have to be over 18 and self-supporting," Richard Elkins, director of admissions, said.

"Each student and situation is different. Mainly we ask them, 'Would you be here if you weren't in school?'"

STUDENTS applying for residency must live in Kansas at least 12 months prior to enrollment and be able to prove they are in continuous physical residence and intend to make Kansas a permanent home, not only while in attendance at an educational institution, but indefinitely thereafter as well, according to the Regulations Concerning Guidelines for the Determination of Residency for Fee Purposes.

There are some things a student can do to help attain resident status. These include continuous presence in Kansas (even while not attending school), permanent employment in Kansas, payment of Kansas state income taxes and owning a home in Kansas.

OTHER CRITERIA which aren't as easily defined are: reliance on Kansas sources for financial support; commitments to an education program which indicates an intent to remain in Kansas, acceptance of an offer of permanent employment in Kansas or admission to a licensed practicing profession in Kansas.

Some students can attend a Kansas school without paying out-of-state tuition if they are in certain curriculums and from certain states. K-State has a reciprocal agreement with Missouri for students that are in grain science, nuclear engineering and architecture.

According to Donald Trotter, dean of Veterinary Medicine, the Vet school has reciprocal contracts with 12 states and each year about 20 new students are able to take advantage of these contracts.

IN OTHER states, students have tried to fight out-of-state tuition as unconstitutional, on either grounds of discrimination or denial of due process.

The Supreme Court ruled in 1973 that states could have preferential fees for resident students, but non-residents had to have a chance to have their status reviewed. Criteria for gaining in-state status could not require a student to drop out of school to become a resident.

The Supreme Court listed aids for gaining residency status as being a year-round resident of the state; being registered to vote in the state; filing tax returns in the state and having property and a driver's license in the state.

These are basically what Kansas requires for residency status, but the chances of a student already enrolled as an out-of-state resident becoming a Kansas resident for fee purposes are slim, according to Ellsworth Gerritz, dean of Admissions.

"It's not impossible, but it's rare. Very, very rare," Gerritz said. "The presumption is against him or her."

AS AN EXAMPLE, Gerritz cited a student from New Jersey who was enrolled in mechanical engineering. He became engaged to a girl from Great Bend and after talking to his future father-in-law, he and the girl's father made arrangements to become partners in business.

To prepare for his future employment, he changed his major to business administration. Six months after he married the girl, he was changed to resident status. (This was when only six months were required for residency).

"We took into account his change of curriculum and his marriage as proof that he intended to stay in Kansas after attending school," Gerritz said of the change in residency status.

"There are very few cases, but it's not impossible."

Ecologist says Manhattan, K-State are in good environmental shape

Manhattan is in good environmental shape, according to Robert Robel, K-State professor of biology and environmental ecologist.

"Riley County operates a landfill south of Manhattan, which is monitored for blowing trash and seepage of acids produced by decomposing trash," Robel said. "Thus, the solid waste problem in Manhattan is minimal."

An ordinance prohibiting outside burning without a permit in the city limits relieves the problem of excess air pollution, he said. The Manhattan Fire Department enforces the ordinance and issues permits for outside burning to those filing an application.

The fire chief inspects the area specified in the application, checking for the danger of fire spreading by blowing trash and making sure the smoke won't bother nearby residents. If the area doesn't meet specifications, the applicant won't get the permit.

A SECONDARY sewage treatment plant, capable of removing up to 85 per cent of the organic matter in sewage, is "in operation and working very well," according to Gary Stith, city planner and staff member on the Environmental Board of Manhattan.

A primary sewage treatment plant, now out of operation, will be converted into a greenhouse and nursery for the city. Manhattan buys its plants commercially and the greenhouse would enable the city to grow its own trees and shrubbery, Stith said.

Stith said Riley County is looking for a new site to locate a trash dump-landfill, as the present site is nearly full.

Environmentally, the K-State campus is doing as well as the city, Robel said, although there is a problem with the odor and runoff from the dairy barns north of the main campus. This will be eased, however, when new barns are built further away from campus.

Loses in race with snails; man sheds 295 pounds

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP)—Dr. Robert Mallin raced snails and lost—a total of 295 pounds.

Eleven months ago, Mallin weighed 490 pounds. Today, after racing more than 5,000 miles on an exercise bike against the snails in his fish tank, he's down to 195.

"The magic is you've got to be motivated. And even then the going it isn't easy," said Mallin, who combined hard work on the bike with a diet restricted to 400 calories a day.

Deciding that being 37 years old "was better than the alternative," he went to an internist and said: "Here I am. Do me."

ORDINARILY, doctors advise against rapid weight loss. But in Mallin's case, the weight was a bigger risk.

Now that it's over, Mallin said, "I think I'm normal." He trimmed his waist from 64 inches to 34 and his jacket size from 60 to 42.

Mallin's story begins in childhood, as a member of the "clean plate club." He went from being "chunky to stocky to stout." By adulthood he weighed 230 pounds.

He gained an additional 260 pounds after his family moved to Alaska and he rose from a "struggling, starving resident" to success.

Splurging on big meals and eating out was "a way to show success." And some thought fat people were "jolly." But, said Mallin, "Generally, fat people are sad."

Crime-fighting agency may be overhauled

TUCSON, Ariz. (AP)—A major shakeup of the nation's main crime-fighting program may reduce Washington's influence in deciding how cities and states handle law enforcement problems, Deputy Atty. Gen. Peter Flaherty said Tuesday.

Reorganization of the nine-year-old Law Enforcement Assistance Agency (LEAA), now under consideration at the Justice Department, also could channel more agency money into court and correctional systems, he indicated.

Flaherty said the reorganization plan, which must be approved by Congress, should be ready some time this year.

Several reports issued last year concluded there was no evidence the LEAA had been effective in its war on crime. Some have suggested that the agency, which has spent $6 billion since its inception, be abolished.

Flaherty's comments, made in a speech to the U.S. Conference of Mayors, was the first specific discussion of the crime control agency since President Carter took office.

FLAHERTY said the agency "has failed to establish proper priorities for its programs and added 'We are not satisfied with LEAA's record.'"

But the former Pittsburgh mayor stopped far short of calling for the agency's abolition, telling the mayors, "It's not all bad, we tend to look at the areas that have failed."

Flaherty said one major change under consideration "and I stress it is only being reviewed, is to convert most of the LEAA funds into a form of special revenue sharing.

"This means that there would be no more separate funding categories" for planning, hardware, police training, courts or correctional institutions.

"Payments to cities and counties would probably be based on population, need and existing patterns of criminal justice expenditures," he said.

"For example, if the state government paid a major share of the total criminal costs in the state, it would receive a major share of the revenue-sharing payments."

Police offer tips on security

The Riley County Police Department (RCPD) has declared the month of June "Burglary Prevention Month."

RCPD Director Willis Penhollow has asked all citizens for their cooperation to reduce the number of burglaries that occur when families leave for vacations and weekend outings.

"By learning and practicing a few simple home protection hints," Penhollow said, "residents can keep their homes from falling victim to a burglary."

Penhollow said failure to know and practice the fundamental techniques of home protection was largely responsible for the many burglaries committed in Manhattan last year.

ALTHOUGH MOST people didn't intentionally invite intruders to ransack their homes, Penhollow said, people are inviting burglaries because they don't practice simple safety measures to guard against burglars.

Professor to study protein molecules

Kenneth Burkhard, K-State professor of biochemistry, is to leave Friday to spend five months at Yale University working under Julian Sturtevant, an expert in microcalorimetry.

Sturtevant will be guiding Burkhard through a technique used to study structural changes which occur in protein molecules.

"I will learn how to use differential scanning and apply that technique to problems I'm working on at K-State," Burkhard said.

"I still won't have the right equipment at K-State. Ours just isn't sensitive enough, but now I'll have the experience to work on microcalorimetry problems," he said.

"This technique basically measures the changes in heat capacity of a substance and it's possible to relate changes in heat capacity to changes in the structure."

Burkhard explained proteins react with many substances and a reaction with a substance results in a change of structure in which the protein increases or loses its activity.

"It is through this process that it's now thought a cell controls its own functions," he said.

Penhollow suggested residents close and lock all doors, including the porch, basement and garage doors. Light your porch and yard with outdoor lights to increase the possibility that an attempted burglary would be seen.

Residents should leave their shades and blinds as they normally do. Closed blinds keep the sun out, but they also make an effective screen for the burglar, Penhollow said.

Be certain all screens are fastened from the inside, Penhollow suggested, and never leave valuables where a burglar could see them.

Vacationers should also cancel all deliveries such as milk, laundry, and newspaper when they leave town.

Residents should also request that the post office or a neighbor hold all mail until they return and notify the police department when they leave town.

"There is no such thing as a burglar-proof home," Penhollow said, "following the suggestions listed will help to protect your home while you are away."

K-State graduate dies in accident

Glenn Teagarden, a May 1976 graduate of the College of Veterinary Medicine, died as a result of injuries in a horsebackriding accident June 8.

The accident occurred on his father's farm in Lacygne, Kan.

A memorial is being established in his name and contributions can be made to the K-State Endowment Association in care of the Glenn Ray Teagarden Memorial Fund. Teagarden was the son of Mr. and Mrs. Carl Teagarden.

New dairy center will allow larger herd, better sanitation

By MARY LOU PETER
Collegian Reporter

K-State's new dairy center is scheduled for occupancy by Labor Day, according to Charles Norton, head of the Department of Dairy and Poultry Science.

The $1.4 million plus complex is two miles north of campus just off Marlatt Ave.

"It was a much-needed facility. We have a reputation for being a leader in the industry," Norton said. "We're expected, as scientists, to be as good as any program in the United States."

THE DAIRY herd now consists of about 300 head of cattle with 125 being milked daily. The new facilities, utilizing a herringbone-design milking system, will accommodate a milking herd of 200.

"We expect to expand our operation," Norton said.

"They need the better facilities," Lloyd Manthe, a dairy barn employee, said. "I think they'll have better fly control because of the lagoons." A lagoon system is planned which will minimize waste problems by mixing manure with water.

ALTHOUGH THE basic unit will be finished in August, construction on the feed center will not begin until this fall, Norton said. Allotted funds will not cover the cost of a proposed hay barn, machine shop and storage and hospital barn.

"The products produced by the dairy facility are incidental to our function, which is teaching and research," Norton said.

Those products, such as milk and cheese, are sold through outlets in the dormitories and the dairy bar in Call Hall. Classes such as the dairy science labs use the dairy herd as a model, learning record-keeping methods, sanitation precautions and modern milking procedures.

"We anticipate, because of the design and efficiency, handling cattle with less employees," Norton said. "At the old center it was often necessary to go through one or two pens to get to a third one. This problem should now be minimized."

Soviets question U.S. newsman

MOSCOW (AP)—The Soviet Union alleged on Tuesday that Los Angeles Times Correspondent Robert Toth has been gathering secret information and barred him from leaving the country. Toth was interrogated for more than four hours and told to return today.

In a note to the U.S. Embassy, the Soviet Foreign Ministry said the 48-year-old Toth "has been engaged in... the collection of secret information of a political and military character."

While an investigation continues, "his departure from Moscow... is not desired," the note read.

Toth was summoned to Moscow's Lefortovo prison where he said a KGB major interrogated him throughout the afternoon and told him to return at 10 a.m. He was not told the charges against him.

HE SAID the interrogation had to do entirely with an incident last Saturday when he was seized on the street by five KGB security policemen moments after receiving a document from a Soviet scientist about parapsychology, the study of mental telepathy and extrasensory perception.

He was interrogated for three hours Saturday.

He said he was interrogated Tuesday by Major O.A. Dobrovolsky, chief of the KGB investigating group, and that the only other person present was an interpreter from the Soviet travel agency Intourist.

U.S. Embassy Second Secretary

Larry Napper was barred from accompanying him. Napper said he was told that under Soviet law a witness does not have the right to representation during an investigation.

The correspondent said Dobrovolsky discussed with him the nature of secret documents.

"I asked how parapsychology could be considered a secret," Toth said. "The impression I got was that if you get any information about science that is not officially released, then that is secret."

Answer to yesterday's puzzle.

FOR TEN CENTS YOU COULD SAVE A FRIEND'S LIFE.

A phone call. A simple, ten-cent phone call for a cab could save your friend's life.

If your friend has been drinking too much, he shouldn't be driving.

The automobile crash is the number one cause of death of people your age. And the ironic thing is that the drunk drivers responsible for killing young people are most often other young people.

Take a minute. Spend a dime. Call a cab. That's all. If you can't do that, drive him yourself. Or let him sleep on your couch.

We're not asking you to be a doctor or a cop. Just a friend.

Privacy enhances apartment living

By TOM FAULKNER
Collegian Reporter

Privacy and responsibility seem to be the two main attractions apartment living has which residence halls lack.

However, many students who have lived in a dorm but left because of the lack of privacy or the increase in dorm price believe they are now being taken advantage of by Manhattan landlords and high apartment prices.

"The Manhattan market price is very high," Marty Snyder, manager of Mont Blue Apartments, said. "But with the hike in dorm prices it is easier to pay for an apartment if you live with two people."

HIGH SECURITY deposits also draw complaints from students. Apartment managers disagree on whether the complaint is founded.

"One hundred per cent of our renters get their deposits back," Snyder said.

"We don't advertise, so we must get good public relations by word-of-mouth from our students because we are always full," he said.

Living in an apartment rather than a dorm spells one thing for Snyder—privacy.

"Privacy is the biggest advantage over the dorm," he said. "You can come and go without any worries."

Campus East Apartments returned the full security deposit to 75 per cent of their student tenants, according to Edrena Adolph, acting manager.

THE OTHER 25 per cent received partial refunds due to damages in the apartments that had to be repaired.

Adolph also believes privacy is the biggest asset to apartment living.

"The average student prefers the privacy of apartment living rather than dorm living," Adolph said. "A one-to-one relationship is easier than a one-to-100 relationship."

Don't be fuelish.

OF THE FEDERAL ENERGY OFFICE

"Students also prefer apartments because they're not as expensive as the dorms," Adolph said. "They can also set their own pace and hour schedule and there is no fixed time as to when they can eat, whereas in dorms they have a fixed time to get a meal."

ROBERT LOGAN, manager of the Wildcat Inn Apartments, believes responsibility is the main advantage of apartment living. "Students learn responsibility through apartment living," Logan said. "They learn that if they don't pay their electric bill, KP&L will turn off the power. They learn that if they don't pay the phone bill, the phone will be disconnected."

"We do what we think is necessary," Logan said of maintenance costs. "We spend more money on repairs and maintenance than anyone in town.

"Every five years we go in and recarpet the apartments, that costs us $400, and every two years we repaint the apartments, and we pay $100 for that," Logan said.

"When students who have lived in apartments graduate, get a job and find a place to live, they will know how to read a contract, and how to pay bills, because they learned responsibility through apartment living rather than dorm living."

"Sometimes students don't understand that they are signing a legal document when they lease an apartment," Debby Dodd, Wildcat Creek Apartments manager, said. "But on the whole, the students were really good about paying when the time came."

City trying to improve south side

BY CHRIS WILLIAMS
City Editor

The dilapidated houses crowd the dirty streets. Garbage bounces along the ground on thrusts of the gusting wind. Doors open and close without assistance and broken glass lies beneath shattered windows.

Children, mostly black, stand on street corners, idly passing time. An aged man slowly uses his cane to make his way to the local grocery store. And in the distance a wailing child cries for its mother.

What may sound like a scene from Harlem or the Watts district of Los Angeles is in reality the south side of Manhattan, located along Yuma and Colorado streets. The classification of a slum area may not be entirely unwarranted.

Although recent statistics are unavailable, 1970 census figures show that out of about 31,000 Manhattan residents, only 850 were black.

Of the 850 blacks, almost 600 of them live in the area located on or near Yuma and Colorado streets. Many elderly, both black and white, also live there.

THE CENSUS indicated houses in Manhattan are on the average worth slightly more than $21,000. Houses on Yuma and Colorado streets were valued at slightly more than $15,000.

Tenants paying rent in Manhattan in 1970 averaged about $100 per month for their homes, while the south side residents averaged about $70 per month.

A visitor to the city who first travels through the south side could conceivably receive a bad impression of Manhattan, a town of poverty and neglect.

Or is it the right impression of Manhattan, a city depressingly shallow?

Cornell Mayfield, director of human resources in Manhattan, believes the lack of motivation and incentive for the residents to improve this area has been the impetus to decay and made Manhattan a "sad town."

"The people of Manhattan live under the facade of progress," Mayfield said. "They build the industry, but neglect the poor, the minorities and the elderly."

MAYFIELD believes the city has its priorities backwards. Instead of repairing streets and modernizing houses and sewage systems, the city planners funnel the money for industry outside of town in an attempt to build the image of a growing city.

Many people will argue the residents of the south side could escape if they really wanted to try. Many of these same people don't believe that the problem is theirs, so they ignore it. It is this attitude that, through the years, has created a feeling of despair for the south side residents.

"You have a social and economic problem because of Manhattan's past attitude which has created a feeling of hopelessness which is then passed on to the young," Mayfield said.

"Because of this hopelessness, the blacks in the city are leaving to live elsewhere and no one is left to succeed and set an example for the others."

"The people need someone to look up to and there is no one here worth looking at."

MAYFIELD said children are most affected by this hopelessness and are quitting school. As a result, they lack the proper training and education needed for a well-paying job.

"Children think," Mayfield said, "Why should I go to school and get some jive job and ride around in a Volkswagon, when I can quit school and get some women and make twice as much money as someone with a master's degree?"

"That tells you where success lies. The pimp didn't graduate from high school and live up to the middle-class ideals of school and training, yet he's the one who has everything to show."

"The older generations have told the younger generations there's nothing that Manhattan has to offer, so the potential leaders have to live elsewhere."

Those who do stay represent a very small minority of the local poor that are unable to get the proper training to attain a good job. The vocational-technical school is filled with minorities, but very few of them from the Manhattan area. And the lack of training for a good job will keep the doors closed for any type of escape from the south side.

"What do you do if you are not trained or qualified for a job," Mayfield said. "And when you do get a job, it's usually lower pay, menial type work."

TO SOLVE some of these problems, various programs have begun to help not only the physical appearance of the south side, but also the people who live there.

Mayfield has recently instituted the Orientation Work program which teaches people of this area about essential areas of life, such as resumes, interviewing and job hunting.

"Most of us from middle-class families take for granted these things because we're brought up learning about them," Mayfield said. "We want them to get a job that allows them to afford things such as encyclopedias and books, as opposed to having just enough money to afford food, clothes and shelter."

The improvement of the resident's homes has become the thrust of the Community Development (CD) program.

Through various federal and city grants, CD hopes to make Manhattan's south side a more attractive place to visit and live.

A PERSON who is the head of a household, single and earning less than $6,900 annually is eligible for up to $12,000 in loans to be paid back over 20 years at 3 per cent interest.

$9,300 for a family of four is also considered low income for the purposes of a loan. Each additional member of the family increases the eligible loan funds $600. If a family's income exceeds $10,000, they are ineligible for a CD loan.

But there are some people who will be unable to pay back the loan. Such a person is then eligible for a grant of up to $5,000.

Farming official attacks Carter's energy policies

KANSAS CITY (AP) — The Carter Administration energy policy is an ill-conceived blueprint for conservation which would spell trouble for the American farmer, the nation's largest farm organization was told Wednesday.

Robert Delano, vice president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, told delegates to the group's national energy conference the president's proposals could force the world's "food machine" — American agriculture — to "run out of gas."

"By our tremendous production American farmers and ranchers have decisively proved that the market system is the best stimulus to production and distribution," Delano said. "This is as true for energy as it is for food."

Delano criticized the administration plan for increased taxation as a way to achieve energy conservation, saying it doesn't address the problem of dwindling supply. Only deregulation of oil and natural gas and production will solve that problem, he said.

"For our part, we say that American farmers will continue to meet the food needs of the nation with plenty to spare for others, provided Mother Nature cooperates in the kind of weather she gives us; provided we are not restricted by government controls or see our markets buried under government-owned commodity we do not run out of gas," he said.

Delano said threats to stepped-up energy production include organized labor, over-weening government regulations, proposals for divestiture of energy producers and "environmental obstructionism."

The theme of less government and a more open market ran like a thread throughout much of the one-day workshop attended by about 150 members of the Farm Bureau across the country.

Delano's address capped the day-long session Wednesday which saw spokesman for the coal, oil, gas and nuclear energy fields deride bureaucrats, environmentalists and over-regulation.

Hatfield cancels Friday speeches

Sen. Mark Hatfield has canceled his Friday speaking engagements at K-State due to a Senate agenda meeting that afternoon, Marion Bruner, Hatfield's secretary, announced Wednesday.

A spokesman for the League of Women Voters said Hatfield will speak at noon as scheduled in the K-State Union Saturday.

Local man sought in kidnapping, rape

Riley County Police and the FBI are searching for Julius Jones, 527 Yuma street, who has been accused of the kidnapping and rape of a 24-year-old Manhattan woman Saturday night.

Jones, a former Fort Riley soldier, allegedly kidnapped the woman, raped her, and then drove her to a south Chicago suburb where he released her.

Authorities said Jones would be charged with kidnapping and the interstate trafficking of a stolen vehicle, both federal offenses. He will also be charged with rape.

Authorities said Jones was last seen in Bolingbrook, Ill., where he dropped the woman off.

Risk factor high for new businesses

EDITORS NOTE: This is the first in a two part series about establishing a business.

By MARK EHRHARD
Collegian Reporter

Going into business can be risky.

Of all new firms started in a year, about one-third are gone within the year and only another third live beyond five years, according to Changing Times magazine.

It is possible, however, for you to own a business and be successful, even if you are not a seasoned businessman.

The first thing you must decide is what kind of business to start. Some fields that look promising are necessity items and services, health and recreational services and equipment, do-it-yourself items, repair services, pollution-control devices, gardening equipment and supplies, pets and pet products and family-type restaurants with lower-priced menus, according to Changing Times.

Whatever business you decide on, it should be one you know something about from experience, special education or natural ability. It also should be one in which there is a real potential for profit, Manhattan small business owners advise.

There are four ways to go into business: start your own enterprise from scratch, acquire a going firm, take on a franchise operation or start out in your spare time with the aim of eventually going full time.

Randy Pierce and Bruce Snead, recent graduates in architecture, have started the Great Plains Shelter Company in Manhattan. The company deals with energy-efficient residential housing.

Pierce was doing this type of work part-time, but had decided to go to graduate school. Snead was approached to take over the part-time work.

The more they talked about the work, the more they both wanted to do the work full-time. Pierce turned down graduate school and the business became a reality.

"In order to start a business, you need to take a close look at what you have to offer, what kinds of skills, what kind of knowledge," Pierce said.

"You decide, 'Here's what I have to offer,' then you look at the other side of the fence at who might want to buy it."

Randy McClanahan started Pots and Plants in Aggieville two years ago when she became dissatisfied with teaching. She said she learned about plants through reading and experience.

"Plants were my only other interest and there was no real place to just get into plants," McClanahan said.

She said she did not do a formal marketing survey, but just saw a need for a place with a wider line of plants and accessories.

To get started, she visited a similar business in another city. She said they volunteered a lot of help and advice and gave her people to contact to start her inventory.

McClanahan has since opened a gift shop, The Added Touch.

Eddi Stillings started in business in a different way. She took over the existing Manhattan Health Foods, although she had no real knowledge of the business.

She bought it five years ago when her husband was finishing school and they needed an income.

"I started on an idea and a commitment," Stillings said.

She said her father helped with some basic business set-ups, such as bookkeeping, but she learned as the business grew. She is now going to expand her shop and open a health food restaurant.

Stillings said she learned from talking to people, but had to separate the non-essential from the good advice.

Pierce said regardless of what type of business you want to do, you need a strong personal commitment to the notion.

Snead agrees starting a business is scary, but said he and Pierce talked it over and asked themselves, "Well, have we really ever failed, just blown it?"

"We both had to say no. So in terms of personal confidence, we feel good and we're excited about it and it feels good at this time," Snead said.

Renovation programs aid south side

This is usually earmarked for the elderly and does not have to be paid back.

Groups other than the aged receive grants, however. It is up to the community developer director who receives the money. A person could receive grant money and still be eligible for a loan. These programs have already improved about 45 homes on the south side.

AFTER the city assesses the house, contractors bid with the owner for the contract to repair the damaged structure. The tenant then signs an agreement with the contractor and the city pays the money, but it is essentially between the owner and the contractor.

There is also a demolition program where old, irreparable structures are torn down.

After the city assesses the fair market value of a damaged house, the city pays the owner the market value plus "re-location money" of up to $15,000. For instance, if a house is worth $10,000 the city will pay $25,000 so that the owner can purchase a new home.

A RECENTLY instituted program is the Neighborhood Clean-up project. Junk cars, furniture, and weeds strewn throughout yards inundate this area and Henry Bolton, a city planner, has begun this program to help residents clean up their neighborhood.

"We are working on the theory," Bolton said, "that the people there do not have the money to remove their junk. They want to live in a nice neighborhood but they don't have the time or money to clean it up."

"So, under a city grant, we have $15,000 set aside to clean the neighborhood. We have the laws that exist that say junk cars and garbage are a hazard to public health. And we could enforce the laws on anybody.

"I really can't say why it is not being enforced. It is not the responsibility of CD but of the County Health Department to residential housing and not commercial businesses. Otherwise, a businessman could have the city clean up his property at the city's expense.

If these programs are instituted, Mayfield and Bolton believe the south side can become an attractive place to live. But Gary Stith, Manhattan city planner, believes the amount of

"For instance, Douglass Center is on this street and anyone who lives on the other side must cross it, so the use of the center could be cut down because of the traffic."

STITH said a housing study made in 1967 and a similar study made in January show that through the various federally-funded programs, the south side is improving. But Stith admits it's still the worst area of Manhatta.

"One of the problems we still have though," Stith said, "is that we've removed the damaged housing, but the federal government has not come through with money so we could build new, low cost housing. So we've wiped out old houses but because we can't build new ones to replace them, it has shifted the whole housing market up which makes it difficult for some people to find housing."

By tearing down housing and not re-building, Stith feels the city is disrupting the social balance of that area and the type of housing important to the people.

"I think you have to provide housing in areas where people feel comfortable," Stith said. "For instance, a high rise would be a dramatic change for someone and they would not feel comfortable living there."

"The people of Manhattan live under the facade of progress. They build the industry, but neglect the poor..."

declare anything against public health and a person could be fined up to $100 for each violation.

"But maybe the people don't have to money to clean it up," Bolton continued, "and we want to give them the chance to improve the appearance of their home and yard."

THE CITY protects itself from being taken advantage of in this program by only helping traffic that travels over Yuma is not helping the situation.

Stith believes a southern bypass connecting K-177 and Fort Riley Blvd. would relieve some of the traffic and help the downtown Manhattan area also.

"The by-pass would be a way of shifting the traffic and alleviating the pace of that area," Stith said. "A great deal of traffic goes up and down Yuma and Yuma is not built to handle all that traffic."

Arnold Miller claimed on Wednesday to have won his second five-year term as president of the troubled United Mine Workers Union and his two rivals agreed the controversial union head appeared a certain winner.

The official count won't be made until July 1, but an Associated Press tally showed Miller holding a large lead with more than 60 per cent of the ballots counted.

Although he failed to win a majority, Miller will lead the 277,000 member union during a crucial period in which the nation is expected to increase its use of coal as a part of President Carter's energy program. Miller also will negotiate with the coal industry this winter.

MOSCOW — American newsman Robert Toth was grilled for 6½ hours Wednesday by angry Soviet KGB agents who told him he was a witness, and "not the accused," the Los Angeles Times correspondent said.

"They wouldn't say who the accused were or the charges. It was 'none of my business,'" said Toth, who was picked up by secret police after a Soviet scientist gave him an article on parapsychology.

In Washington, the U.S. Senate approved a resolution condemning Toth's detention as a "gross violation" of the 1975 Helsinki accords and called on the Carter administration to take "every appropriate means" to obtain Toth's safe return.

President Carter told reporters, "We've expressed our strongest objections about what has been done about Mr. Toth." He said any attention given to the Toth case by the international media "will have an impact" at a time when an international conference in Belgrade is reviewing human rights progress since the Helsinki meeting.

"It is our understanding that Toth has been told he is not going to be formally charged," a U.S. State Department official in Washington said.

WASHINGTON — Senate Majority Leader Robert Byrd and President Carter agreed Wednesday that Congress could not override a veto on the water projects bill.

Byrd urged lawmakers to compromise on the 17 projects Carter wants to scrap as economically and environmentally unjustified.

Byrd cited the House's narrow 218-194 vote Tuesday to keep nearly $170 million for the projects in a $10.2 billion public works bill.

"It seems to me the effort ought to go forward to work out a compromise between the executive and the Congress," Byrd said. "Otherwise, we would have to do our work all over again" in the event of a veto.

Carter, asked at the White House whether he thought a presidential veto could be sustained, replied, "I think so." But Carter declined to say he would veto the public works bill.

NEW YORK — Star pitcher Tom Seaver, dubbed "The Franchise" for his 10 years of premium performance, was traded by the New York Mets to the Cincinnati Reds Wednesday night, it was learned.

The Reds, two-time defending world champions, will be giving up four players to get Seaver, regarded as the best in his craft in the past decade. The new Mets will be pitcher Pat Zachry, infielder Doug Flynn and top minor league prospect Steve Henderson, an outfielder.

The Associated Press also learned that a fourth player would be included in the deal, but it is not played would be included in the deal, but it is not

Mondale's role in Africa diminishes

WASHINGTON (AP)—Vice President Walter Mondale, who two months ago emerged as the Carter administration's key spokesman on African affairs, is reducing that role following meetings with African leaders. Carter originally had asked Mondale to pull together the U.S. policy that Mondale thought the administration should follow in Africa.

For a month and a half before he met in Vienna in May with South Africa Prime Minister John Vorster, Mondale spent a great deal of time on southern Africa, according to his press secretary, Al Eisele.

The vice president studied each country, its history, background and leadership and its relations with its neighbors.

But this concentration is over. "It was clearly a temporary thing," Eisele said. "That part is over, but he still maintains a special interest in Africa."

EISELE said the day-to-day work in African policy areas was being handled by the State Department and at the ambassadorial level.

One White House official portrayed Mondale's reduced role as a natural pause. "He's doing less because other things are happening," this official said, referring to talks being conducted at lower levels.

He said the reduced role did not reflect a shift in policy or a lessened administration interest in Africa.

Eisele denied that Mondale was disengaging from African affairs. "He's maintaining a close watch in African developments and keeping himself fully briefed," the spokesman said. Most recently, the vice president met with former Rhodesian Prime Minister Garfield Todd in Washington.

Mondale said Tuesday that his performance as vice president might permanently alter the vice presidency.

He said he is "completely engaged in the whole broad range of issues affecting the federal government" and he expressed appreciation for the broad role assigned to him by Carter.

City gives hope to poor south side

For too long, the south side of Manhattan, near Yuma and Colorado Streets, had been decaying into irreparable ruin.

Houses were uncared for, garbage strewn throughout yards and vacant lots, and people seemed apathetic about the appearance of the neighborhood.

Not only was the physical decay a disgrace for the people of Manhattan, it also created a feeling of despair for the people who lived there.

Recently, however, the city of Manhattan has entered into the task of renovating the area because the residents could not afford to do it themselves.

Various federally funded programs have been instituted to demolish the damaged houses and build new, low cost, attractive housing.

More importantly, programs have been started to help the people help themselves. Many residents are minorities or are elderly and face the age-old problem of discrimination.

Children are being educated about such facets of life as job-hunting, interviews and writing resumes.

The new programs can create goals for the young people and give them the desire to stay in school so that they might one day escape the hole of poverty and feel the sunlight of success.

The Community Development department and the city of Manhattan should be applauded for their efforts to rebuild both physically and emotionally the south side.

By rebuilding the area they are creating a feeling of optimism for the residents of this area so that one day they may be able to look back with pride and ahead with hope.

Now, for a touch of levity...

The Collegian has been criticized lately for taking itself too seriously this summer. There is an opinion around the newsroom that editorials and columns in this paper are too news-oriented and that discussions of Korea, Andrew Young and arms sales are fine but should be spaced out between "funny" or "light" pieces.

Another gripe around here is that this writer has been getting an inordinately high amount of hate mail lately.

IN AN EFFORT to ease the problems of taking ourselves too seriously and of my getting too much hate mail, this space will be devoted to copy of a lighter vein which, I hope, will not be too serious and will not lead you (the readers) to take pen in hand and slur my character.

As a result the Collegian now presents a current events test. Following are a series of questions out of the news of the past week. If you select the correct answer to four or five of the questions, consider yourself proficient in the current events of late. If you can answer two or three correctly, you probably keep up on the news, but not very well. If you can only select one (or less) correct answer to the following questions, you obviously don't read the Collegian. Here goes.

1. Secretary of State Andrew Young recently called which of these men "racists": a. Former President Richard Nixon. b. Former President Gerald Ford. c. Former President John Kennedy. d. Former President Lyndon Johnson. e. All of the above.

2. Anita Bryant, champion of the anti-gay movement and orange juice salesman is a member of which of these churches: a. Mormon. b.

Unification c. Dade County Orange Juice Diocese. d. Southern Baptist. e. All of the above.

3. The U.S. House of Representatives refused last Wednesday to cut the size of former President Richard Nixon's: a. Wife, Patricia. b. Fleet of golf carts. c. Staff and office funds. d. 18-minute gap.

4. From the Vatican, Pope Paul denounced last week which of the following incidents: a. The Belmont Stakes. b. South Molluccan terrorism in Assen. c. President Carter's effort to cut off funding for 16 water projects including the Grove Lake reservoir in Kansas. d. Anita Bryant doing the jig after her victory in the homosexual discrimination election in Miami.

5. Former President Ford last Tuesday: a. Called Andrew Young a racist, also. b. Rode superhorse Seattle Slew to a triple crown in the Belmont Stakes. c. Shot a hole-in-one in the Danny Thomas Pro-Am golf tournament. d. Announced he plans to challenge Calif. Governor Jerry Brown for that post in 1978.

WELL, how did you do? Here are the answers, so check and see how you scored. 1-e, 2-d, 3-c, 4-b, 5-c. Naturally, there was more than this going on last week, but if you scored four or five, you should be able to comfortably carry on a conversation with even the best-informed.

Back to the point of this column. The Collegian realizes that one of its many functions at K-State is to entertain. Another function is to inform and allow room on this page for opinion. We've been fortunate in the short two weeks in print to have received so many letters.

Letters to the Collegian are welcome, but there are a lot of other people around here who would, I'm sure, like to hear from you all. Now, about Carter's Cuban policy...

Letters to the editor

Dubious note of thanks

Editor,

I would like to express my appreciation to the Kansas Parks & Recreation Authority and life guards of Tuttle Creek River Pond Area for the possible saving of my life.

Tuesday afternoon I took advantage of my newly acquired ten dollar yearly pass for Kansas State Parks at Tuttle Puddle. While out paddling around on my surfboard, I was approached by a lifeguard on a paddle board and duly notified that my surfboard was not a small water craft, and was not equipped with a life vest or paddles, and therefore would be unable to handle situations arising such as the wake of passing canoes or paddle boats. I'm sure that after riding the waves of Southern California for five years, I would be able to handle a two inch ripple from a canoe or paddle boat, and could easily manoeuvre my board out of the way of any such craft.

The fact that I and others that take surfboards, rafts, etc. and simply float around, are in any more danger that the weekend renter of a paddle boat or canoe that frequent the Puddle is ridiculous. How can anyone float around in the swimming area with 200 kids splashing and frisbies hitting you in the head? This apparently seems logical to the park system, because I was promptly escorted to the nearest point of land and told in so many words not to come back and to feel lucky I was not "saved" by a park ranger, as my life would have cost $40.00 for court costs plus any fines placed upon me.

I thank the Park Authority and their life guards of assuring me of a continued safe, but very dull summer. I also wish to nominate these people for the Collegian's weekly onehanded round of applause.

Questions purpose of 4-H roundup

Editor,

Can someone enlighten me about the purpose of gatherings such as the recent 4-H club roundup on the K-State campus? Who sponsors such meetings? Who pays for them?

From reports in the media the youngsters were subjected to political indoctrination by an assortment of corporate businessmen, Vietnam war "heroes", and super-patriotic flag-wavers. One businessman, ironically from International Harvester corporation, extolled "our free enterprise system" to the young farmers, and the hero from Vietnam told the youngsters he had fought in their behalf against the Vietnamese.

Are these men supposed to be examples for our young people to emulate? President Acker opened the meetings by urging the assembled young people to "put their buckets down" to that they might derive benefits from the conference. We think that if they did their buckets came up full of farmyard muck.

Girl Scout murderer sought

LOCUST GROVE, Okla. (AP)—One man was questioned Wednesday in the murders of three young Girl Scouts, but authorities said the importance of the interrogation was "being blown way out of proportion."

Three highway patrolmen and a deputy sheriff went to Miami, Okla., about 60 miles from here to question a man arrested on a complaint of public drunkenness. The man later was returned to his cell.

Mayes County District Atty. Sid Wise said the questioning was not unusual, and that officers were talking to many people in the northeastern Oklahoma area.

The nude and battered bodies of Lori Lee Farmer, 8, and Doris Denise Milner, 10, both of Tulsa, and Michelle Guse, 9, of Broken Arrow, were found early Monday in a wooded area of Camp Scott, a summer retreat for girls. About 100 other Girl Scouts were camping out in various parts of the 410-acre retreat when the girls were killed.

AN AUTOPSY showed the two younger girls died from blows to the head and the older girl was strangled. All three were sexually molested.

As the investigation widened, Girl Scout leaders throughout the nation reported a steady flow of calls from concerned parents.

"People mostly want to talk to us about security," said Merle Neal, executive director of the Mid-Continent Council of Girl Scouts in Kansas City, Mo., which is scheduled to have 1,100 girls from the eight-county area at camp this summer.

"We have checked the police department, which has been our security consultant all along, and it said we should go right on doing what we've been doing. They say the girls are safer in camp than they probably would be when involved in most other summertime activities," she said.

THE SEARCH for clues, meanwhile, shifted from Camp Scott to a ranch adjoining the campsite in rolling, heavily underbrushed countryside. Three specially trained German shepherds were flown in from Pennsylvania to assist in the search.

Nicholson's performance good

'Chinatown' plot confusing

"Chinatown" is showing at 8:00 p.m. today in Union Forum Hall. Admission price is $1.

By JIM CHALFANT
Collegian Reviewer

A good detective movie is tough to make.

Just when you think you've done all you're supposed to, something else pops up. Many a good movie has been ruined by not fitting in all the important parts.

This must be what happened to "Chinatown".

Director Roman Polanski and company started off big with Jack Nicholson as their star. He plays J.J. Gittes, a detective who specializes in tracking stray husbands. He is a fine actor, and does well in this role.

We find him in Los Angeles in the late 30s. Now that's certainly a fine setting for a good mystery.

Of course, every great detective must have a police lieutenant out to get him. You know the kind, the tough guy who always plays it by the book and continually gets outsmarted by the hero.

For this highly original role, Polanski recruited Perry Lopez, who is also quite good.

And who can forget the pretty girl mixed up in crooked things? Not Polanski. Faye Dunaway plays the pretty girl.

DUNAWAY is the perfect complement for Nicholson. He's a little crude and a little seedy, but basically the typical good guy.

Dunaway, on the other hand, pretends to be sweet and innocent, but like always, the audience can see her for what she really is—sinister.

Brilliant so far, right? Well, the movie runs into trouble now. It needs a plot.

What Chinatown offers us for a plot is one of the most twisted and tangled two hours and 11 minutes I have ever seen.

Gittes starts out chasing after Mr. Mulwray, who is a husband with "another woman". Los Angeles is involved in a drought and Mulwray also gets involved through his job at the water department.

In fact, everyone soon is involved as Gittes faces a lawsuit, a scandal involving the whole water department and an affair with Mulwray's wife.

WHEN we finally reach the movie's end, the audience and poor Gittes are much the worse for it. You'll be amazed at how much you and Gittes will put up with.

There's a lot of violence in Chinatown, enough to give it a "R" rating. However, if a lot of blood and a weird plot don't bother you, go see it.

It does have several good points. Nicholson is unforgettable as J. J. Gittes. And his joke about the man and his wife is pretty good, too.

The real joke, however, is on the audience and not a bad one at that.

Implanting brain pacemakers helps mental patients recover

NEW ORLEANS (AP)—Mental patients once considered hopelessly ill are on the road to recovery with "brain pacemakers" implanted in their skulls, doctors at Tulane University said Wednesday.

"It's like I'm living in a calm after a storm had ended," said one patient describing the change in her condition after surgery. That patient and two others appeared in a videotaped interview shown to reporters at a news conference Wednesday.

Ten of 11 patients who voluntarily underwent the operation have shown considerable improvement, some within a matter of days, Dr. Robert G. Heath, chairman of the psychiatry and neurology department at Tulane's School of Medicine, said at the news conference.

"I think it's too early to advocate that we have an overall cure now. But the results speak for themselves," he said.

He said he does not believe the device could be misused and that "I don't think I could control anyone's mind by doing this. I don't think it could overrule one's free will."

Subcommittee cuts water projects bill

WASHINGTON (AP)—In a compromise move, a Senate subcommittee voted Wednesday to eliminate funds for eight of 17 water projects that were narrowly approved by the House over President Carter's objections.

Sen. John Stennis, D-Miss., chairman of the subcommittee on public works appropriations, said his panel tried "to make some adjustments with some consideration for what the President said."

"I don't want to see this bill vetoed," Stennis told reporters after the committee acted in a closed-door session on the $10.2 billion public works appropriations bill.

The bill now goes to the full Senate Appropriations Committee for review, after which it will be submitted to the Senate floor and then to a conference committee to settle differences with the House version. The Senate bill originally contained funds for 506 projects.

Akers' camp attracts future stars

By EUGENE PERKINS
Collegian Reporter

Three years ago, Judy Akers' Wildcat Basketball Camp consisted of only one session with 40 campers. This year, there are three sessions of 100 girls each.

Akers, women's basketball coach, is "enthusiastic" about the growth of women's basketball, but notes "it is still in its infancy."

"Girls are still four to five years behind boys as far as basketball is concerned," Akers said. "Most boys participate in some type of organized program in grade school, but most girls do not participate in an organized program until their sophomore year in high school."

One of the goals of Akers' camp is to try to lessen this gap between men's and women's basketball, she said.

Sports

The camp began May 29 with an advanced session open only to girls with two or three years of varsity experience. The second session was open to high school girls only. This week's session includes both junior high and senior high school girls. The campers, housed in Haymaker Hall, pay $125 a session.

"The camp, especially the advanced session, draws girls from throughout the Midwest," Akers said. "We've had three girls from St. Louis and one girl from Illinois attend the camp this summer."

The camp's staff consists of eight high school and college coaches. Also, at one time or another, all the members of the K-State women's basketball team have or will have helped with the camp, with the possible exception of sophomore standout Eileen Feeney.

Brenda Mauck, sophomore from Limon, finds the camp a challenge.

"I want to coach in a small high school after I graduate," Mauck said, "so I'm sure my experience in basketball camp will help me."

The campers spend an average of eight hours a day on the basketball court receiving instruction from Akers and the rest of the staff. They also participate in one-on-one competition, shooting contests and team competition.

"We give the girls two hours of free time in the afternoon when they can play tennis, swim, or go to the Union, but many choose to stay in the gym and practice basketball," Akers said.

"I've learned how to handle the ball a lot better," Peggy Daniels, 13, said of her experiences at the camp. "The coaches are real nice and they know their stuff."

Akers said she hopes some of "their stuff" (the staff's knowledge of basketball) will rub off on the campers.

Injured Nicklaus, Watson co-favorites to capture 77th U.S. Open Championship

TULSA, OKLA. (AP) — Jack Nicklaus, with a slightly sprained right ankle, and Tom Watson, with the best record in golf, are solidly entrenched as the men to beat in the 77th U.S. Open Championship.

Although neither really needs an added incentive in the physically and mentally exhausting test that makes up the most prestigious of all the game's tournaments, each has at least one.

For the courageous Watson, a Tom Sawyer who grew up to become the Masters champion, there's the opportunity to extend his chances for the unaccomplished Grand Slam of golf.

For Nicklaus, the greatest player the game has produced, there's the opportunity to acquire a record-matching fourth national championship, extend still further his unequalled domination of the Big Four events and again reassert himself as golf's no. 1 performer.

Should either falter in the strength-sapping, 100-degree heat forecast for today's start of this 72-hole chase there's an impatient, jostling horde of the world's finest shotmakers eagerly awaiting the tiniest chance, willing and able to take the longest gamble to acquire the crown.

Jerry Pate, who, as a rookie, won the Open last year, will seek to become the first man since Ben Hogan in 1951 to successfully defend his Open championship.

Miller selected for World Games team

Laurie Miller, leading scorer for the K-State women's basketball team last season, was one of 10 players chosen to compete in the World University Games, head basketball coach Judy Akers announced Tuesday.

The games will be held in Bulgaria in late August.

Eileen Feeney, starting guard for the women Wildcats last season, was picked as one of two alternates.

Miller and Feeney competed with over 50 women at a tryout camp in Kansas City, Mo. held last week.

Miller, a junior from Smithville, Mo., and Feeney, a sophomore from East Hanover, N.J., averaged over 15 points a game.

Another starter, Leann Wilcox, a junior from Kansas City, Mo., and Tammy Tonstad, an incoming freshman from Independence, Mo., will attend the try-out camp for the Junior Pan American games which begins today at Squaw Valley, Calif.

Leaders issue rebuke to Amin

LONDON (AP) — Commonwealth leaders, issuing their first-ever rebuke to a fellow member, took note Wednesday of "sustained disregard for the sanctity of life and of massive violation of basic human rights in Uganda."

But the final communique of a 33-nation Commonwealth conference here neither mentioned Ugandan President Idi Amin, whose military government has been accused of murdering 100,000 Ugandans in a 6½ year reign of terror, nor spoke of any sanctions against him.

The communique minced no words, however, in a lengthy denunciation of white-minority governments in southern Africa.

The Uganda statement, which constituted only a tiny fraction of the final document, was a compromise between some states that wanted a strong censure of Amin and others — predominantly African — that feared the issue would breach black African solidarity and distract from the southern Africa question.

The final version said "it was the overwhelming view of Commonwealth leaders that these excesses in Uganda were so gross as to warrant the world's concern and to evoke condemnation by heads of government in strong and unequivocal terms."

Thus, any leader who did not want to be associated with the "unequivocal terms" could claim he was not one of the heads of government referred to.

Study shows Laetrile ineffective for cancer

NEW YORK (AP) — Laetrile proved to be of no value whatever in either preventing or curing cancer in a four-year study in which the substance was injected into rodents, scientists reported Wednesday.

But the scientists said their experiments indicated Laetrile had no harmful effects except when excessive doses were given orally or by faulty injection. They said they could not test whether Laetrile may lessen pain, as its supporters claim.

The scientists said their report probably would have no impact on the public and that tests on humans still may be necessary.

"Obviously this cannot end the matter here," said Dr. Lewis Thomas, president of Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center, which announced the results.

"A great number of people in the general public, due to skillful public relations, believe it has magical properties," Thomas said.

The scientists said some of the mice died after being given large doses of Laetrile orally or by accidental injection into the intestines. Laetrile can emit cyanide when digested.

In Attica, N.Y., a 10-month-old girl died last Saturday after swallowing an undetermined number of Laetrile tablets which her father had been given permission to import for his own use. Physicians attributed the infant's death to cyanide poisoning.

Laetrile, known technically as the chemical amygdalin, is derived from apricot and peach pits and bitter almonds. It is banned from interstate commerce by the Food and Drug Administration on the ground that it has not been shown to be safe or effective.

Action on Laetrile is pending in several states and it is already legal in seven — Alaska, Indiana, Florida, Arizona, Nevada, Texas and Washington.

Sloan-Kettering released two manuscripts, 90 pages in all, at the news conference. One dealt with transplantable tumors in rodents and the second with spontaneously occurring cancer in mice. Laetrile was tested against 10 forms of tumors.

"Laetrile showed no beneficial effects against any of these types of cancer, which are formed by transplanting cancer cells into previously non-cancerous animals," the Cancer Center said.

Deserter's widow seeks recompense

WASHINGTON (AP)—The Pentagon came face to face with an unusual war casualty Wednesday, the crippled and indigent widow of the only American soldier shot for desertion in this century.

Antoinette Slovik was slightly stooped in her wheel chair as she asked the Army Board for the Correction of Military Records to clear the name of her late husband, Pvt. Eddie D. Slovik.

Slovik confessed to twice fleeing combat and was executed by firing squad in France on Jan. 31, 1945. Mrs. Slovik seeks $68,000 payment plus interest on the soldier's National Service Life Insurance policy.

Federal law says those convicted of desertion or killed by lawful punishment cannot receive insurance benefits.

However, Ray Williams, secretary of the Army Board, said previously that while the law clearly is against the widow's claim, "the board may correct any military record where, in its judgment, such action is necessary to correct an error or to remove an injustice."

MRS. SLOVIK, 62, epileptic and arthritic, also asked the board to have her late husband's body removed from the dishonorable section of a small cemetery in France to a grave where she said he might rest in peace.

Slovik was one of 49 men sentenced to death for desertion. Only Slovik was executed.

Union raises price of foods

The day of the 15c drink is over in the Union Stateroom cafeteria.

The prices of six items have decreased. Soft drinks, coffee and hot and iced tea have increased 4c, Burritos have increased 5c, and the salad bar increased 12c.

"The reason for the increase is that it costs more for us (food service) to buy the products," said Terry Adams, director of food service.

"Food service offers 280 items at any one time and we only raised the prices of a handful," Adams said.

ADAMS added students "will drink a cup of soda, fill it again and then pay for it," therefore getting more for their money.

"The food service is here to serve the students so I'm really reluctant to raise the prices, especially during the middle of the term because students put themselves on budgets and could not afford to spend the extra money," Adams said.

No more price increases are in sight until fall.

Course discusses women in science

"The ideal is for career planning and placement to be sex blind, but still there exist underlying psychological problems that make women different," said Ann Kammer, biology instructor.

And she is trying to overcome these problems.

Last spring, Kammer, Cheryl Granrose and Jan Sloan offered for the first time a course about women in science, "Science, Sex and Society." The class, in which 14 people enrolled, was designed to reach women who knew they were interested in science, but not sure of how or what to pursue, according to Kammer.

AIDED by a one-year, $15,000 grant from the Women's Educational Equity Act, the three women wrote the text for the course and studied the level of female interest in science. The course, offered again in the fall, includes a contemporary and historical study of women in science, lab work and career counseling.

"It (number of enrollees) was too small a sample to say the course made any difference," Kammer said. "It takes a while for word to get around about a new course."

Long term goals of the course are to overcome the stereotypes of scientists, to better understand the factors which influence successful women in science and to attack the problems faced by women in a science career, she said.

Other universities and organizations have been awarded similar grants. The director of the Colorado State University project studying inequities and sex role stereotyping in professional agriculture will be at K-State June 24 to share his findings.

Morale of officers low

Fact-finding committee issues report

By VELINA HOUSTON
News Editor

The fact-finding committee appointed to investigate allegations K-State Security and Traffic officers have been sleeping on duty released its final report Thursday.

The committee, appointed by Paul Young, vice-president for University development, was composed of Walt Smith, director of the K-State Union, Lee Ruggles, assistant professor of business affairs, and Ruth Romig, a classified clerk in the College of Veterinary Medicine.

In the report issued to Young, the committee said the quality of K-State officers is "good" and the officers are "strongly motivated." It stated a "lack of adequate training, equipment and facilities" as reasons for the low morale of Security and Traffic.

They (committee members) are saying there are not enough training opportunities provided to keep the Security and Traffic staff up to date," Young said.

YOUNG said other areas which the committee found to be lacking include radio systems, the kinds of vehicles available and the equipment in the cars, "some of which is not the newest." The committee raised the question as to the dependability of the radio systems Security and Traffic uses.

"The University sends all officers to training school in Hutchinson," Young said. "There is sometimes a delay, but all receive the training."

Young said he has asked Paul Nelson, director of Security and Traffic, that records be examined for determination of any evidence of officers sleeping on duty.

THE OFFICER who originally made the allegations, however, told the Collegian Wednesday that Nelson said "if there were two (officers) in the car, one could doze."

"The disciplinary actions stated by the committee mean discipline under the state civil service system," Young said.

The committee said it reviewed allegations of sleeping on duty and found evidence of "cat-napping" in patrol cars in which there were two officers.

"This is still not enough information," Young said. "Within the civil service system, time, place and evidence must be acquired, almost as if you were going into court. This is precisely what Chief Nelson will be investigating."

YOUNG said the security force at colleges and universities is either a sub-department under Physical Plant or reports directly to the vice-president or president.

"That (sub-department system) is what we had until today," Young said.

"Two thirds of the universities across the country use the other system and we have decided to make the change also.

"In doing so, I will be dealing with questions of discipline and training programs and exert direct influence on the Office of Security and Traffic."

The committee has been dissolved.

Acker predicts zero athletic budget deficit

By DIANE GONZOLAS
Collegian Reporter

President Duane Acker delivered some good news concerning K-State's athletic budget deficit in his "State of the University" address Thursday.

"We think on June 30 it will be about zero," Acker reported to about 300 alumni gathered for their annual banquet.

"One of my biggest jobs in the next six months will be to help the Intercollegiate Athletic Council to resist adding new sports," Acker said.

Acker gave credit for this accomplishment to "the positive attitude among students and faculty that has significantly replaced a negative attitude."

Acker received a standing ovation from the alumni before beginning his speech which focused on the "tradition of individual excellence" among K-Staters.

Among those former K-Staters Acker mentioned were the minority leader in the U.S. House of Representatives, the Chief of Staff of the U.S. Army and the President of the Kansas Senate.

Acker also reviewed specific achievements by K-Staters who graduated during the last year. Student successes reflect the efforts of faculty dedicated to excellence in "Student successes reflect the efforts of faculty dedicated to excellence in teaching, research and extension," Acker said.

Acker assured the alumni that the dairy barns, which he called "some of the most beautiful buildings on campus," would not be torn down. Instead, they will be connected with the new plant science building to be built near the Endowment Association building.

Bonds for the new recreation complex have recently been sold, Acker said. The low interest rate on the bonds is 5.3 per cent.

Alleged rapist, kidnapper found

Julius Jones, a former Ft. Riley soldier wanted in the kidnap-rape of a 24-year-old Manhattan school teacher, was arrested Thursday in Gary, Ind., according to the FBI.

Jones is being held in lieu of $100,000 bond and is charged with kidnapping and interstate transportation of a stolen vehicle. Jones is accused of abducting the woman Saturday night from the parking lot of a local store, raping her in a vacant apartment, and then driving her to Bolingbrook, Ill. where she was released.

Victim identifies alleged rapist

Second gridder bound over for trial

By CHRIS WILLIAMS
City Editor

The K-State co-ed who claims she was gang-raped in the Athletic Dormitory on March 30, identified former K-State football player Roy Shine as one of her rapists in testimony during Shine's preliminary hearing Thursday.

Based on the woman's testimony, Judge Jerry Merschon has ordered Shine bound over for trial with Monday set for his arraignment in District Court. Shine is free on $3,000 bond.

Jerome Holiwell, a freshman football player, has been the only other suspect named in the investigation as a possible participant in the rape and will be arraigned Monday, June 27.

The woman identified Shine on the basis of his nickname "Kid" and on the fact that she saw his profile in the dimly-lit room while he was allegedly raping her.

THE WOMAN identified Shine as strong, black, with course, textured hair. She said he wore a slight mustache but no beard.

Three witnesses, however, including head K-State football coach Ellis Rainsberger, testified that Shine has worn a beard since last fall.

The woman also testified she heard someone in the room refer to someone else in the room as "Kid," a nickname Shine is known by.

Rainsberger also testified that Shine is sometimes called "Kid," but Shine's attorney, Howard Fick, pointed out that the nickname is common with many people being called "Kid."

The woman said that on the night of March 30, she arrived at the athletic dorm at about 12:30 a.m. with three football players, including Holiwell.

She said she went inside to Holiwell's room, and after about an hour, fell asleep.

SHE TESTIFIED that she was awakened by a loud "thump" and saw the silhouettes of a number of men standing around the bed. She said she could only positively identify Shine because the room was too dark.

The woman said as one man held her down, two other men started to remove her pants.

"Cut it out you guys, leave me alone," she testified as saying to the men. She said she started to cry and pleaded with them to stop.

After being raped by two men, she said she heard someone say "C'mon Kid" as the third man proceeded to rape her.

While he was raping her, she said he looked sideways and a light from the parking lot made it possible for her to see her rapist's profile. She said the profile belonged to Shine.

Two more men raped her and then left her alone, she said. She got dressed, she said, and walked to Wayne Brown's room, located directly across from Shine's room in the A-wing. She said she was then driven home.

SHINE testified that after returning from a basketball game, at about 10:30 p.m., he stayed in the dorm and went to bed at about 12:30 a.m.

Shine said he was awakened by a commotion in the hall, saw the young woman who had been allegedly raped, and told Brown to "take this young lady home."

Shine said he then went back to his room, talked to Melanie Bouden, her roommate, Linda Weller, and Shine's roommate, Manzy King, and after the women left, went to sleep.

Bouden, a witness for the defense, testified that Shine was in his room from 11 p.m. and did not leave the room except to investigate the disturbance in the hall.

Entrepreneurs offer advice

Editor's Note: This is the second in a two-part series about establishing a business.

By MARK EHRHARD
Collegian Reporter

To many, being one's own boss offers a chance to be creative as well as resourceful. Those already in business for themselves also realize there are headaches in entrepreneurship.

Manhattan entrepreneurs say one thing small business starters will have to contend with is the day-to-day routines.

"Organizational form has been one of the major things I've been working on," said Bruce Snead, graduate in architecture. "Are we going to be corporate, partnership or what? What's the best way to set this thing up so we don't get burned on taxes." Snead and a partner started the Great Plains Shelter Co. in Manhattan.

Randy McClanahan, a former teacher who owns Pots and Plants and the Added Touch, has twice as much work with two businesses. "The biggest headache is taxes and government work," she said. "The paperwork is astounding."

SHE SAID SOME things you have to deal with include federal identification numbers, a federal deposit card (which requires filing a quarterly return), a federal unemployment rate, a state employment number (filed and paid quarterly), state sales tax (filed once a month), workman's compensation, state unemployment and filed on fixtures and inventory with the county assessor.

Eddi Stillings, owner of Manhattan Health Foods, said not only does one think about work while on the job, but also on the rest of his free time.

"It takes a lot of energy and it consumes you pretty much 24 hours a day. It's hours, work and energy," she said.

ACCORDING TO Changing Times Magazine, one should have enough money on hand to cover business operating costs and family household expenses for at least the first three or four months or have an outside income.

Snead and his partner, Randy Pierce, have an advantage because they offer a service rather than a product. They don't have an inventory to keep in stock. It takes a while, however, for any business to produce a cash flow.

"There is a lot of anxiety that goes along with a business. You're not really sure about anything," Pierce said.

"It's scary," Snead said. "You start off and you're throwing your income on the line. You don't always get a consistent monthly income."

"It is imperative to have a good banker who is willing to stand behind you," McClanahan said.

STILLINGS SAID having no alternate income is a drawback with Manhattan Health Foods, but she has "made do."

"My income was and is flexible but the business has supported us from the beginning," she said.

Being one's own boss can also create a strain.

Stillings said responsibility, making her own decisions, being a fair boss and trying to do what is right is the hardest part of owning her own business.

McClanahan agrees it's hard, but it's an ego trip. It gives a lot of personal satisfaction, she said.

"It's marvelous. I really love it. I wouldn't trade it for anything," she said.

When you open a small business, she said, you're fighting the large business. As a result, you must be willing to "do" for the customer.

"You not only have to be familiar with the community, you have to become involved with it and the people," she said. "You don't just communicate; you care. You must really care."

STILLINGS SAID the real support she has received is from her customers.

"The person who's spending the money deserves the energy, the time and the effort. You have to make your people happy," she said.

The final piece of advice the entrepreneurs had for small business starters is to realize mistakes are going to be made and the best that can be done is to try to have everything covered.

"I assume someone starting a business either has some experience or has a lot of time to find out and read and talk to people," Snead said.

"It's something you consider," he said. "You just consider it a lot and really look at as many aspects of it as possible and who you're getting into it with. If it feels right and you're not putting yourself out on a limb beyond belief, take a shot. You only live once."

Tonight Show's Shaughnessy to conduct percussion clinic

Ed Shaughnessy, drummer for Johnny Carson's Tonight Show, will conduct a jazz clinic for all interested K-State students 9 a.m. to noon, Sunday, in McCain Auditorium. Phil Hewett, assistant professor of music, said, "Shaughnessy will do a percussion clinic," Hewett said. "He will demonstrate how he plays the drums and then he will answer questions."

A jazz band camp will be held Wednesday through Saturday for 20 high school students. Topics to be covered include jazz types, origin and history, he said. "These students were selected from outstanding high school jazz musicians from Kansas," Warren Walker, professor of music and supervisor of the summer school artist series, said.

A CONCERT including rock, swing and jazz will be presented at 8 p.m. Saturday at Arts in the Park.

"Shaughnessy will do an extended solo using a form of Indian rhythm patterns," he said. "He learned it from a friend who studied it in India."

Other soloists include saxophonist Earl Hesse, assistant professor of music and lab band director at Henderson State University, Arkadelphia, Ark.; trombonist Dave Sporhny; and trumpeter Jim Sellards, a music teacher at Topeka West High School.

The four artists will be backed up by the High School Jazz Ensemble, made up of students from throughout the state, and K-State's Summer Concert Jazz Ensemble, Hewett said.

The K-State jazz ensemble placed third in international competition in Switzerland last summer.

NEW YORK — The drive to ban abortion picked up steam this year as seven state legislatures passed resolutions urging enactment of a constitutional amendment to make termination of pregnancy illegal in most cases.

Thus far, abortion opponents have failed in Congress, but they have fared better at the state level. Four states, Louisiana, Missouri, Indiana and Minnesota, approved resolutions prior to 1977 calling for a constitutional convention to pass an anti-abortion amendment. Approval of similar bills came this year in Massachusetts, Arkansas, Rhode Island, North Dakota, South Dakota, Utah and New Jersey.

An AP survey showed that most of the anti-abortion measures are similar to the one passed in North Dakota, calling for adoption to "guarantee the explicit protection of all unborn human life throughout its in utero development subordinate only to saving the life of the mother..."

NEW YORK — Young Ron Guidry pitched a brilliant three-hitter and Mickey Rivers ripped three hits, including a home run, leading the New York Yankees to a 7-0 victory over the Kansas City Royals Thursday night.

Guidry struck out seven and walked two in notching his first complete game in the major league. He retired 17 consecutive batters over one stretch.

The Yankees supplied Guidry with an almost instant lead as Rivers opened the first with a double and scored on Willie Randolph's triple. Then, with Thurman Munson at bat, Dennis Leonard committed a balk and Randolph trotted home with the second Yankee run.

MOSCOW — Soviet Communist party leader Leonid Brezhnev took over the nation's presidency Thursday to become the first top Soviet official to combine the power of party chief with the dignity and honor of president.

In the biggest Kremlin power shuffle since Nikita Khrushchev was ousted 13 years ago, the Soviet parliament removed Nikolai Podgorny from the largely ceremonial office of president by unanimous vote and gave it to Brezhnev.

Podgorny, Brezhnev and Premier Alexei Kosygin made up the troika leadership that took over from Khrushchev in 1964. In recent years, however, real control of the country has centered more and more around Brezhnev.

Brezhnev's new office was not expected to change policy of consulting with other Politburo members and governing by a form of "collective leadership" in contrast to the one-man rule of Stalin and Khrushchev.

WASHINGTON — A House investigations panel released documents Thursday showing the both Gulf Oil Corp. and the government of Canada actively participated in an international cartel that sought to fix uranium prices and supplies.

Gulf Board Chairman Jerry McAfee, testifying before the panel, acknowledged that a Gulf Canadian subsidiary was involved in the cartel, but he said no U.S. antitrust laws were violated.

He claimed that Gulf was compelled to enter into the agreement by Canadian officials - a claim that some of the documents appeared to contradict.

The documents included a flurry of confidential memos between Gulf officials in Canada and the United States, dating to 1972, concerning Gulf participation in the cartel.

Finance Minister Donald Macdonald told reporters in Ottawa that the alleged cartel was prompted by his government's desire to protect Canada's uranium industry from "predatory" actions by the U.S. government and industry.

Abortion is individual right

Trying again to legislate morality, the state legislatures of seven states adopted resolutions urging a constitutional amendment be enacted to ban abortion in most cases.

Abortion is a volatile issue and a private one. It should remain a private one.

Legislatures and courts should keep out of the issue and let it rest where it should . . . with the expectant parents.

IF A woman decides to have an abortion, no matter what the reason, she should be allowed to seek competent medical attention to receive the abortion.

If a man and a woman decide they do not want a child, they should be able to carry out their decision without interference of uninvolved individuals.

The contention that abortion is murder holds sway over legislators who listen to the impassioned pleas of those who are not directly involved in the individual's decisions about abortion.

ABORTION is murder in the eyes of some and is a relief in the eyes of many.

Those who view abortion as murder do not have to condone it, or partake in the act. But, they should allow those who want abortions to have them.

A woman is a person and a person should be allowed to do with her body as she pleases. If she wishes to have an abortion, she should not have to seek it illegally. It is her decision and her right to make that decision.

Can you imagine the furor if legislatures enacted a law requiring all men over 24 to have a vasectomy?

How about a law requiring all men to sire children before they reach 24, or face a stiff jail sentence?

We do not have the right to legislate what a person should do with his or her body.

Student illiteracy shocking

The controversy surrounding the inadequacy of Kansas schools has finally hit home.

Talking to some incoming K-State freshmen, I was filled with two-fold anger.

Mathematics courses at these high schools were not mandatory in the first year and ignored in subsequent years. Basic grammar was taken lightly and spelling was something considered to be from the era of the one-room school house.

TO FURTHER support my argument, one of the students turned to his friends and asked, "How do you spell revolution?" He received several versions of the spelling, none of them correct.

Why are parents complaining about the educational system? Did Johnny lose his ability to read six months before graduation or have the parents of this child not taken the time to acquaint themselves with the problem?

If the latter is the case, then the parents should take into account of themselves. But the school systems must share some of the credit or blame.

PARENTS entrust their children to strangers to provide them with the educational "basics" - reading, writing and arithmetic.

The problem is in the basics. The traditional cornerstones of teaching have been overturned by the new teaching "ideals" - open classrooms, allowing the student to study whatever is fun for him and lose discipline in the classroom.

Discipline is an integral facet of learning. Without discipline the educational process cannot begin.

IF THE idea that schools are producing illiterate students isn't maddening, the fact that K-State will admit them is.

Students of such low caliber shouldn't be allowed to occupy seats which could be filled by students who have a solid educational background.

I'm not implying that these students shouldn't go to college. Let them attend a junior college. A University is no place for teaching remedial reading and writing.

If this type of student continues to be allowed admission to K-State, our hard-earned diplomas soon won't amount to a hill of beans.

Rape is not a laughing matter

It's something women cry about and something men occasionally laugh about. It is surrounded by myth and controversy.

It is rape.

Rape is the act of forcing a woman to submit to sexual intercourse. Men often laugh and claim a woman can't be raped if she doesn't want to be. Even some women cling to this myth.

A woman does not invite rape, not even if she dresses in skimpy little summer outfits and flirts with every man around.

Rape is not a crime of passion or a sexual desire, rape is an act of violence and those who commit such an act are not seeking sexual pleasure, but are seeking pleasure from committing acts of violence.

Often, rapists are misogynists seeking revenge for a hurt inflicted upon them by a woman or women.

AND THE victim may not be the person who hurt him. The victim can be any woman.

Most women do not believe they will be or can be raped. This is as great a myth as the "humorous" one that all women have to do is keep their knees together to avoid rape.

It is a far more dangerous myth, for it is not until women realize rape is becoming a prevalent crime and begin to inform themselves about prevention and avoidance that they will be able to protect themselves.

Unfortunately, for women, rape is a fact of life. It may not be something to discuss with your mother, but it is something you should make every effort to inform yourself about.

Most women are raped by men they know. It is unusual, but not impossible for the rapist to be unknown to the victim.

SOME BASIC precautionary measures should become part of your routine.

- When getting into your car, always look in the back seat. Someone could be hiding there.

- Make sure the locks on your doors are adequate. Bolt locks offer more protection than chain locks.

- Don't open your door to strangers. Make sure you know who is on the other side and if necessary, ask for identification.

- Don't walk alone at night, particularly in dimly-lit areas. If you must walk alone, keep an object such as a key or a lighted cigarette in your hand which can be used as a weapon. Also, don't walk near shrubbery, and if necessary, walk in the middle of the street.

- List your name in the phone book and on your mailbox with your first initial ONLY.

- Keep your keys in your hand so you don't have to fumble in your purse looking for them.

- Keep your car doors locked when the car is parked and especially when you are driving around town.

- Keep your gas tank full. Don't invite risk by running out of gas in a deserted area.

- Don't give out any information over the telephone to an unknown person. Do not let the caller know you may be alone in your house or apartment. If necessary, take the caller's phone number and call him back.

- Know what you are capable of doing. If you decide you would fight a rapist, make sure you are able to fight. If necessary take a self-defense course.

DIFFERENT ITEMS can be used for protection. A lemon squeezer, easily held in the hand and filled with a detergent solution will temporarily blind an assailant. Purses can be used to strike someone.

Screaming will sometimes scare away an attacker, so don't be afraid to raise your voice and holler.

But, most of all, be aware. Don't become paranoid and look over your shoulder all the time, just be alert and observant of things going on around you.

Remember, it CAN happen to you.

Letter to the editor

Health plan 'unhealthy'

Editor,

In response to Ken Miller's editorial on national health insurance, I am amazed as to the innocence of the editorial.

The desire for a national health insurance plan originated because of the rising costs of medical care.

Yet, a major reason for this occurring is the soaring malpractice claims. Since 1970, malpractice claims have increased more than 900 per cent, mainly due to the new ideology of "getting something for nothing."

It is interesting to note that recently a Chicago bus had an accident with an automobile. At the time of the crash there were 7 passengers on the bus. When the police arrived more than 50 people claimed they had ridden the bus and were entitled to compensation for their "injuries." This is not an isolated occurrence. There are countless other nuisance suits in our courts today.

AS TO unnecessary surgery, most hospitals have committees established for the sole purpose of investigating all surgeries. Violators are subject to suspension of their hospital privileges.

Financially, the national health insurance plan is unfeasible. Conservatively estimating the plan, it would add more than $80 billion to the national deficit.

The insurance plan would make some people believe that medical care was free. This would prompt excessive demands on doctor's services as patients flocked to their doctors with both trivial and imaginary complaints.

THIS WOULD reduce the doctor's capacity to care for those who really need help.

The national health plan also would swamp the doctors and the government with paperwork as government bureaucracy is famous for red-tape and reports to prevent abuses and to insure that the public was getting "it's moneys worth".

Finally, the cost of medical care under a national health insurance would actually soar, not reduce, as the medical profession would be snarled by the red-tape and the public taking full advantage of a "something for nothing" medical service.

As Senator Kennedy once said,

The Collegian welcomes letters from readers.

All letters must be signed and include proper identification. This would include title or classification, major and telephone number.

Letters may be submitted (preferably typed) in Kedzie 103 or the editorial desk in the newsroom.

"We must look at the record," and we should. European countries such as Sweden, West Germany and France have nationalized health insurance. They are also plagued by rising medical costs, reduced quality of medicine practices, doctors strikes and less research in medical fields.

Mike Ross track camp attracts young thinclads

Fifty-two boys and girls, ages 10 to 18, attended the Mike Ross Track Camp this week. The camp began Sunday and will end today.

"Full-time campers pay $110 for living and eating at Haymaker Hall," Mike Ross, head track coach, said.

The camp's staff includes Ross, assistant track coach Jerome Howe and women's head track coach Barry Anderson.

K-State track men Vince Parette, two-time Big Eight triple jump champion; Frank Perbeck, who took eighth in javelin at NCAA; Darnell Washington, a member of the winning Big Eight mile relay team; and Dan Shirer, whose 4A state indoor high jump record still stands, are also assisting with the camp.

THE WOMEN'S track team is represented by Big Eight shot-put and discus champion Linda Long and 880 yard and mile winner Rene Urish.

The coaches use these sessions to refine the technique of the campers in all events.

"We use video-tape extensively," Ross said. "We tape the campers while they are performing at the track and then play back the tapes at classroom sessions back at the dorm."

"The kids really seem to enjoy the camp and learn a lot," Ross said. "We have a great percentage of returners from year to year."

"The coaches really enjoy it too," he added. "We're usually working with the kids from early in the morning until late at night."

Alumni club meeting features K-State class of '27 initiation

By DIANE GONZOLAS
Collegian Reporter

Daisy McDowell lives in Billings, Mont., enjoys politics and baseball and is 102 years old. She graduated from Kansas State College in 1895, making her the oldest living graduate of K-State, according to Janet Ayres, associate director of alumni relations.

McDowell is also the oldest member of the Golden K Club. The club, organized in 1968, recognizes those who graduated from K-State 50 or more years ago.

"The main thing the group does is have an annual meeting featuring initiation of new 50-year graduates," Roger Regnier, a 1924 graduate in agriculture and economics, said. Regnier, who went on to get his masters in education, is a Manhattan resident and was president of the Golden K Club in 1975.

THE CLUB'S president is the only elected officer, Ayres said. His sole function is to preside at the annual meeting. New members receive special membership cards with their names printed in gold.

The attendance at the annual meetings is good, Ivy Olds, a 1913 home economics graduate, said.

"I think it's great," she said. "I think everyone who comes gets a big kick out of it or they wouldn't come."

"You see people you knew many years ago," Regnier said. "They've changed a lot and that's always fun."

"We've always recognized the woman and the gentleman who came the farthest," Olds said.

"It's always fun. In fact, in 1973, the gentleman who came the farthest was from South Africa."

The Golden K Club has 2,197 members Ayres said. The class of 1927, which will be initiated today, will add 273 more.

Choral symposium begins Saturday

The second annual Flint Hills Choral Symposium begins at K-State Saturday and will continue through June 26, Rod Walker, director of choral studies and activities, announced.

John Aldis, director of the London Philharmonic Choir and holder of the Master Teacher Choral Chair, will be guest conductor for the symposium for the second year in a row.

"We have representatives coming from 11 states," Walker said. "There will be 125 people participating and that includes the orchestra, soloists and chorus."

The week-long symposium will feature three concerts this Sunday, June 24 and 26.

"We will have activities such as history of the Mozart Requiem, sessions on choral reading of new literature, and vocal technique all week," Walker said.

"What we are trying to do is get local support for the symposium," Walker said.

Campus copy centers vary

There are three copy centers on campus catering to University needs.

Mark Wille, supervisor of the Union Copy Center, said the Union's main market is K-State students and faculty.

"We do some public work, anybody may use the center, but usually we serve students and campus organizations," he said. Wille claims the Union's "the best copy center on campus." It is also the most expensive.

One copy cost 10 cents and gradually decreases in price as the number of copies purchased increases.

"We're employed not by the state, but by the Union," Wille said. "We're like a small, independent corporation and we have to budget our money to fit in with the Union's allocation."

THE ENGINEERING Copy Center, located in the basement of Seaton Hall, is another copy facility open for University use.

Kim Reinhardt, supervisor, said the center is mainly designed for architecture and engineering students and professors.

"We aren't here to make a profit," Reinhardt said. "We're here as a service to the engineering departments."

Reinhardt said the center has high-quality reproductions.

The engineering copy center charges five cents per copy for the first 25 copies and three cents per copy after 25. The center copies theses, prints with colored paper, binds theses and supplies its own bond paper.

THE ARTS and Sciences Copy Center, supervised by Donna Crawshaw, caters to Arts and Sciences departments.

"We give discount rates to our departments, but we also do work for outside departments," Crawshaw said. "We operate on a cash basis with students."

"Because the arts and sciences center is used mainly for departmental work, students may have to wait a couple days for the final copies to come through during a busy season," Crawshaw said. The center charges three cents per copy for loose paper copies and five cents per copy for bound paper copies.

Both the Engineering and the Arts and Sciences Copy Centers receive their supplies through state contracts. Companies put in bids to K-State, which orders from the company with the lowest bid. The Union Copy Center relies on its profits and Union allocations for its supplies.

Archaeologists dig into the past

The Kansas Historical Society and the Kansas Anthropological Association, a group of amateur archaeologists from Kansas, are conducting an archaeological dig in Rice County.

The site was inhabited by the Great Bend Astecks (Wichita Indians) whom Coronado visited in quest for the mythological "Seven Cities of Gold."

Discovered in the late 1800's, the site has been investigated by historians and archaeologists. An archaeologist of the Smithsonian Institute, Washington, D.C., studied the site and believed Coronado visited the Great Bend Indians. Coronado wrote about them in 1541.

Further evidence of contact between the Spaniards and the Great Bend Astecks has been found by artifacts in "Cache-Trash" pits. The Indians used these pits to store foodstuffs. When the pit soured, became rodent infested or was no longer needed, the Indians would use the pits to store garbage.

"The Cache-Trash pit is a treasure chest for the archaeologists. All of the artifacts are in a concentrated area," said Don Rowlinson, archaeologist for the Kansas Historical Society. "From these pits we can find out how affluent the society was from what they threw away."

ARTIFACTS found in the trash pits includes Spanish chain mail (metal bits which were part of Spanish armor), metal awl (leather puncher), Indian-made pottery, hide scrapers, beads, turtle bone and clamshells; decayed vegetables, buffalo and deer.

"Pole molds from the building structures were also found, from these we can determine how large the structures were," he said.

"Their round houses were more of an environmental adaptation than scientific. Living on the plains with the strong wind, the houses provide a curve for the wind to go around instead of blowing through," Rowlinson said.

WHAT ARE theorized by the archaeologists to be ceremonial mounds have been found a few miles from the original site.

"It's only a theory, but a very substantive theory, that these ceremonial mounds are positioned on astrological alignment with the summer equinox," Rowlinson said.

Rowlinson said this type of finding with substantial proof is "not rare but very uncommon."

The Historical Society and the Anthropological Association will be making further studies on Kansas Indian tribes this summer.

Hatfield describes conflict between growth and nature

By NANCY DENNING
Collegian Reporter

There will not be a comprehensive energy program out of the White House or out of Congress, Mark Hatfield (R.-Ore.) told the Manhattan League of Women Voters (LWV) here Saturday.

"There will be one in the next year or two with both groups (Congress and the White House) working piece by piece, block by block," he said.

Speaking to approximately 120 people at the LWV conference on human values and city living, Hatfield said, environmental protection and economic growth are not either or questions or issues.

PEOPLE ARE alarmed without facts and react without responding, he said. Congress will not back off with environmental legislation already on the books. What is needed, he said, is public education through such organizations as the LWV.

"What is needed is responsible action without jeopardizing economic needs," Hatfield said. "There have been 8,000 Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) statements since 1970 and they have presented few quarrels to existing bills. In five years there have been 654 cases with only four permanent court injunctions.

"The Environmental Impact Statements (EIS) look good on paper and are sound in theory," Hatfield said, "but in implication there is no goal but a diversion into maximum amounts of paper work."

REFERRING TO the beverage container and re-cycling bill, written in 1973, but still in Senate committee, Hatfield said, "it was met with fear by the major bottling companies."

This fear centered around consumers not returning containers and an increase cost to the consumer. Within the first year of enactment in Oregon, however, roadside litter was decreased by 26 per cent in a piece by piece count and 35 per cent in volume, Hatfield said.

"A national system of mandatory return of soft drink and beer containers should be implemented," Hatfield said. "This law should be supported by local groups on a national basis. With such a mandatory return there would be a projected increase of 118,000 jobs by 1982.

"Clean air legislation is the most controversial topic on Capitol Hill," he said. Congress is trying to strike a "happy balance" between themselves and the automobile industry on clean air bills.

Technologically, the automobile industry could comply to clean air acts now, but because of commitments to stockholders and sales, they are not, Hatfield said. The industry has until 1980 to comply.

"Laws are only as good as the public that support them," Hatfield said. "There must be public support under environmental quality and economic growth."

Ogden residents flee homes

Heavy rains cause local flooding

By KEN MILLER
Managing Editor

Almost seven inches of rain fell on Manhattan and Ogden late Friday night, causing wide-spread flooding and property damage in both communities.

Authorities called it the worst flooding in southern Riley County since the 1951 flood.

Ogden was hardest hit because of the many creeks and streams which join near there and because it lies much lower than Manhattan.

In Ogden, flooding forced the evacuation of more than 200 families, and the Kansas National Guard was called in to patrol the streets and to prevent looting of trailers in the disaster area. A 7 p.m. curfew, placed on the entire city, was still in effect Sunday.

A RED CROSS relief station was established at the Ogden Elementary School to provide coffee, sandwiches and cots to flood victims.

While there were no serious injuries in either town, several mobile homes in a southeast Ogden trailer park were heavily damaged by quickly-rising flood waters. At least seven trailers yielded to eroding foundations and fell into the muddy creek beds.

Property damage in Manhattan and Ogden was unknown pending more progress in the massive clean-up efforts.

While flooding was at its worst late Friday night in Manhattan, Ogden residents didn't realize the real effect of the flood until early Saturday morning, when local creeks overflowed and filled low-lying areas such as the trailer park. Many awakening Ogden residents were caught by surprise Saturday and didn't hear the city's sirens.

IN MANHATTAN, property damage was less-severe, but many cars were caught on city streets and submerged.

The Wildcat Creek overflowed early Saturday morning, filling its floodplain, but it receded by Saturday afternoon.

A second thunderstorm early Sunday morning didn't result in additional flooding, as most of the city's drainage facilities had a chance to release much of the flood water Saturday afternoon.

In Ogden, some of the blame for the flooding was placed on the K-18 bypass route to I-70.

Regents approve University budget

The Kansas Board of Regents approved its first budget requests Friday, and declared the K-State Veterinary Medicine College as an agency separate from K-State. As a result, further appropriations will be made directly to the KSUVMC.

"The cost of educating veterinary students is much higher (than for other students), and that cost inflated the amount K-State received per student," Terry Matlack, student body president, said.

The regents also gave K-State the go-ahead to appoint an architect for final planning of a new plant science complex.

THE FOUR-STORY complex will be located at Denison and Claflin Roads, and will extend 1,000 feet north of Claflin to incorporate the dairy barns.

The regents also authorized beginning preliminary plans for a coal-fired power plant.

Formal approval was given to the $5 Union fee increase, raising the K-State student activity fee officially to $24.25.

A new program in Women's Studies was approved to allow K-State to offer a second major in that area. The University of Kansas also will offer a major in Women's Studies.

Also approved was an amendment to a Kansas administrative regulation defining "residence" for fee purposes. The regulation now states resident classification can be given to students who obtain a Kansas driver's license, pay local personal property taxes in Kansas, register to vote in Kansas and reside in Kansas when classes are not in session.

Committee report remains vague

The fact-finding committee appointed to look into charges that some K-State Security and Traffic officers were sleeping on the job has been dissolved.

The results of the investigation remain vague.

The committee reported the officers were "strongly motivated to improve their performance on duty," but were suffering from low morale.

The low morale problem stems from the "lack of adequate training, lack of equipment and facilities." It is fine and commendable that the committee took the time and made the effort to discover these facts about our Security and Traffic office, but what happened to the problem which originated the investigation, sleeping?

THE COMMITTEE announced they had found evidence of "cat-napping" while officers were in two-man patrol cars, but no mention was made of what disciplinary action would be taken to reprimand these officers.

Vice-President for University Development, Paul Young has asked Paul Nelson, Chief of the Security and Traffic office to look into the sleeping incidents uncovered by the committee. Young said there was not enough evidence at the present time to instigate punitive action.

Well, then, what was the committee for?

All the committee produced was a report. Nelson still must investigate the allegations, something he could have started without the time-consuming efforts of the committee.

While it is good to discover what other problems the Security and Traffic office faces, the original problem of officers sleeping on duty has not been resolved. Nor have any suggestions been forwarded to reduce the possibility of officers sleeping in patrol cars.

We await the results of Nelson's investigation, as we awaited the results of the committee's investigation, and hope he will come up with some more substantial information.

Job titles provide us a niche

Yes, there is a Santa Claus. The U.S. Employment Service says so in its Dictionary of Occupational Titles.

It also says there are mermaids, snowmen, kiss mixers, brain pickers and backside grinders.

The employment service lists these job titles, along with better-known titles such as butcher, baker and candlestick maker, in the dictionary it compiled to help define specifically what work Americans do.

SOME OF the titles listed in the dictionary are funny, some innocently obscene and a few might make you angrier than a Santa Claus without Christmas if you knew the government was calling you that. If you see your job defined here, just remember this is the official U.S. Government definition for your livelihood:

A butto-maker makes cigarette butts, while a back-shoe girl repairs boots and shoes. A backside grinder grinds optical lenses.

A bad-work girl repairs garments, while her friend the blind hooker makes eyelets in shoes. A pillow girl, meanwhile, distributes pillows on a bus and a knock-up man makes window sashes.

A cat chaser directs placement of logs floating down to a river landing and signals the donkey engineer where to drop the logs.

Santa Claus impersonates Santa Claus during the Christmas season. Mermaids perform underwater ballet routines to entertain spectators, using an air line. A snowman chops ice and frost from refrigerator pipes and coils, using hammers, chisels and other hand tools.

Brain pickers and snout pullers work in meatpacking plants, picking brains and pulling snouts.

A kiss mixer mixes dough for lozenges.

Some titles have uncomfortable definitions. An animal husbandman is defined as anyone "engaged in the exploitation of animals." The book does not define "wife's husband" or say whether he is engaged in the exploitation of wives.

BECAUSE the book was compiled before the women's rights movement, it contains many sexist terms. While men foremen, executives and academic deans, women struggle through life defined as scrap table girls, pillow girls and bad-work girls.

Once the women's liberation movement began to de-sex our language, the Employment Service in 1975 published what it called "Job Title Revision to Eliminate Sex and Age Reference Language from the Dictionary of Occupational Titles." The paperback de-sexed 3,500 job titles.

Thus, busboys and busgirls became dish carriers. Assemblers became assemblers. And knock-up men, who under any other name would still toil at making window sashes, became "setter-up sash and door."

The dictionary even has a definition for the strip-tease artist "One who entertains audiences by gradually divesting herself of clothing to accompaniment of music, displaying feminine assets in a teasing or provocative manner."

There are container-maker-filler-packers in the dictionary. There are boring machine operators (who are probably not at all boring).

And should the hard knocks of life become too hard for us, there are psychiatrists, asylum attendants and finally, casket assemblers, casket coverers and casket inspectors.

LOS ALAMOS, N.M. — The worst of eight fires that have scorched more than 17,000 tinder-dry acres of New Mexico and Arizona land raged out of control Sunday near a huge cache of explosives at the research center where America's first atomic bomb was developed.

More than 1,000 fire fighters were on hand — some of them called away from fires in Arizona — as the blaze swept through 6,000 acres of forest and spread to within two miles of the city of Los Alamos with a population of 17,000 in north-central New Mexico.

At the Los Alamos Scientific Laboratory technical site, where nuclear research programs are still under way, the fire missed a magazine of military explosives by less than 800 yards on Saturday. Forest Service officials said the cache could still be in danger if the winds changed direction or speed.

WASHINGTON — Amid warnings that poor people may spend the extra money on "circus tickets," a House panel has voted to drop a requirement that food stamp recipients put up some cash to get the stamps.

The payment rule had been cited as the greatest barrier to the program for the five million eligible families who don't now buy food stamps. Government calculations predict only 300,000 to 880,000 of them will seek the aid with the rule gone, however.

KANSAS CITY — John Mayberry doubled home George Brett from first base in the ninth inning Sunday to give the Kansas City Royals an 8-7 victory over the Minnesota Twins.

$7.7 billion pipeline ready; Alaskan oil to flow today

PRUDHOE BAY, Alaska (AP) — The world's largest and most expensive private construction project, the $7.7-billion trans-Alaska oil pipeline, begins carrying black gold today. Oilmen say the procedure will be about as dramatic as turning on a garden hose.

"Everything is ready to go, we're in good shape. There is a lot of hurrying and scurrying going on . . . mostly cleaning up for reporters," said Mike Jens, manager of Pump Station No. 1.

Startup of the 800-mile line from Alaska's North Slope oil fields to Valdez, an ice-free port on Prince William Sound, "is not a spectator sport," said Henry Mowell. He is vice president of operations for the Alyeska Pipeline Service Co., the consortium of eight oil companies building and operating the line.

THE ACTUAL startup will be executed on Mowell's orders at Valdez. The crude is expected to reach the terminal no less than 30 days, and no later than July 20.

Alaskans have dreamed of this day ever since July 1968, when the Atlantic Richfield Co. and Humble Oil & Refining, now Exxon, confirmed discovery of oil.

Alveska plans to move 600,000 barrels of oil through the line daily almost immediately after startup.

By the middle of next year, 1.2 million barrels will be transported daily, equal to 7 per cent of the nation's daily consumption of 17 million barrels.

The pipeline, three years in construction over some of the most forbidding terrain in North America, has been ready to perform for weeks. Testing of equipment has been under way ever since Alyeska notified the federal government 60 days ago that the 48-inch diameter steel tube, 12 pump stations and $1.25-billion terminal at Valdez were ready.

Large surplus to cut wheat prices

BY DOUG HALL
Staff Writer

The Kansas farmer can thank his efficiency in producing wheat for this year's low wheat prices.

Enormous surpluses of wheat in the U.S. and Canada from bumper harvests of the past two years have driven the price of wheat to about 60 per cent of last year's price. Farmers have planted more wheat than ever this year and are expecting a record crop.

As a result of the depressed market, wheat farmers can't expect much of a profit on the crop, said Leonard Schruben, professor of agricultural economics.

"I can't think of a wheat farmer that's making money this year," Schruben said. "You can buy wheat cheaper than you can raise it. This is the nature of farming. It's a high-risk enterprise."

THE PRESENT price for a bushel of wheat ranges from $1.65 to $1.90 in Kansas. Prices depend on how far the wheat must be shipped to reach the area's principle terminal market in Kansas City. Western Kansas farmers thus end up getting less for their wheat.

"Last year and the year before we've harvested over two billion bushels of wheat in the U.S.," he said. "This is an increase of about 500 million bushels over previous years." At the same time, grain exports have dropped about 200 million bushels, he said.

"It doesn't take much extra supply to beat down the prices," Schruben said. "There is no way of knowing when the surplus will be used up."

"It'll take until the next dry year for wheat production. We've had unusually favorable conditions in the world for wheat production this year," he said.

PAUL KLOVER, vice-president and manager of the Kansas Agricultural Marketing Association, an affiliate of Kansas Farm Bureau, said he isn't predicting relief for the farmer this year.

"I can't see any relief to the low price with the spectacular crop coming on," Klover said. "It's anticipated that it'll be the largest amount of wheat ever harvested in Kansas. And we're going into harvest with the largest holdover of wheat ever."

The federal government supports the price of wheat through loans, Schruben said. Government loans, which also vary in amount with the farmer's location, are about 15 per cent higher than the present market grain price. They are nonrecourse loans, he said, meaning the security of the loan is the wheat itself.

WHEN THE farmer takes out a loan on his crop in storage, the 6 per cent interest is deducted from the cash he receives. If the market price of wheat goes up, the farmer sells his wheat and repays the loan. Otherwise, the federal government takes the grain.

"The farmer can get more cash by putting his crop on loan than on the market right now," Schruben said. "This is just another mechanism for price supports. That's how the government gets into the grain business."

John Armstrong, president of Kansas Farm Bureau, believes the farmers who have diversified their income sources will not be hurt as badly by the low price.

"I think the farmer who hasn't put all his eggs in one basket — who hasn't planted all wheat — is going to survive longer," Armstrong said.

"Despite what the farmer's condition is financially, he can't go on indefinitely with the price of wheat below the cost of production. I'm sure there will be some bankruptcies. Of course, there's always been some, but a greater number this year," he said.

THE LOW wheat prices will affect not just farmers, but the whole Kansas economy.

"There are many people in Kansas highly dependent on agriculture," Schruben said. "Not just farmers. Take a banker who's loaned money on wheat in the field at 50 cents higher than the price on the market. He's going to be very concerned if wheat prices don't go up."

Other small town businesses, such as those dealing in farm machinery and fertilizer, also will be affected, he said.

"This will also greatly affect the tax revenues of the state of Kansas. If the price of wheat doesn't go up, the price of wheat-producing land is bound to go down. There isn't any part of our economy insulated against this."

"In the 1920s, the collapse of the agriculture industry brought on the depression," Schruben said. "I'm not predicting the same thing will happen now. I'm just saying that it could. There's always a possibility of a (national) collapse at the collapse

Planned retirement center stalled again

By DEAN SPEIRS
Collegian Reporter

The Manhattan Retirement Foundation's (MRF) plans for a retirement center have been set back until July 11, Jim Morrison, MRF president said.

The Metropolitan Urban Area Planning Board ruled against the proposed project last week because of what it called "poor land-use planning."

"I think there is a 100 per cent chance the proposal will be approved by the board on July 11, which is its next scheduled meeting," Morrison said. "The changes we'll make will answer all of their questions and complaints."

The delay will cost MRF an estimated $50,000, he said.

"Each month of delay costs approximately one per cent of the budget," Morrison said. "And phase one of the project has a $5 million budget." He said he hoped for a special meeting of the board to reconsider the proposal.

MORRISON said the board could easily have cleared up the problems it saw during the meeting last week, which would have saved the wasted money. The board refused to negotiate, however, so MRF must suffer the delay while alternate plans are drawn up, he said.

Earlier this year, the retirement center plan was stalled because of the potential for earthquake damage at the site chosen for construction on Kimball Ave.

Morrison said he has questions about the ruling of the board. "I don't think a 12-story building is offensive," he said. "But Patty Eidson, one of the board members, felt a high structure on the ridge of a hill at the edge of the community would stick out like a sore thumb."

"I thought we could keep the environmental people happy by minimizing the number of parking spaces. We kept it down to six-tenths parking spaces per dwelling unit because elderly people don't tend to have as many automobiles as other people might. They thought we should have one-and-one-half spaces for each unit, however."

MORRISON SAID he is optimistic about the project despite the difficulties.

"It'll all work out, it's just frustrating," he said.

Eidson said she expects the project to eventually be approved. She claimed the board's ruling against the project last week had nothing to do with aesthetics.

"The issue was land-use planning, period," she said. The proposed 12-story structure is objectionable, however, she said.

"It would be a formidable structure blocking the view of the entire valley, which is a questionable land use," Eidson said.

"They (MRF) went before the board totally unprepared," said Nita Hunt, College Hill nursing home administrator. "They hadn't worked out problems with drainage and they had made no provision for street difficulties." "I doubt if they'll ever get their project going."

College Hill nursing home is part of Kare Free Nursing Centers, a Wichita-based organization which plans to build a retirement center in the Staggs Hill area. Kare Free will begin construction around Aug. 1, Hunt said.

Morrison and Hunt said enough demand for retirement centers exists in Manhattan to assure success for both operations, despite competition between the two.

Pipeline works; black gold coming

PRUDHOE BAY, Alaska (AP) — The trans-Alaska oil pipeline began carrying its hot black gold Monday with "a leak here and there," as expected.

"That's part of startup," Mike Jens, manager of Pump Station No. 1, said of the leaks, which caused no major problems.

"When the oil goes through the pipe for the first time, there are fittings that need to be tightened additionally."

Startup began right on schedule at 2 p.m. EDT with oil entering the $7.7 billion line at the pump station. But it took about an hour longer than expected to get oil through the station and into the line headed south beneath one of the world's most forbidding landscapes.

THE JOURNEY will last from 30 to 45 days with the pipeline, the legacy of nine years of environmental and political debate, pumping initially at 300,000 barrels per day — later at 600,000 barrels and finally 1.2 million barrels a day.

"For the punchy people up here, it's just another day," said Dave Higgins, of those who had worked seven straight 12-hour days leading to startup. "I suppose we will wake up later and realize it's a historic day."

ROTC cadets undergo field training

By RICK SEITZ
Collegian Reporter

Twenty-three army Reserve Officers Training Corps (ROTC) cadets from K-State are attending the Army ROTC Advanced Camp at Fort Riley.

"The objective of the camp is to train college students to become army officers," said Brig. Gen. Daniel French, commander of the third ROTC region and camp commander. "The quality of the cadets attending the advanced camp is remarkably high; they (the cadets) are so motivated and enthusiastic."

French said the cadets are evaluated by their platoon leaders and platoon sergeants on a daily basis.

"The cadet is under constant pressure to perform well because he is constantly being evaluated, especially when he is in some type of leadership position," he said.

IN ADDITION to being evaluated by their platoon leader and platoon sergeants, cadets are rated by their peers twice during the camp. French said there are "no Mickey Mouse" type duties at the advanced camp.

"Hazing, swearing around cadets and Mickey Mouse is strictly prohibited," he said. "We don't paint rocks or have cadets stand in line for hours. We are training these people to be officers, not marionettes."

French said no demerit system of any type exists because a demerit system leads to "Mickey Mouse."

While at advanced camp, all cadets have access to the post exchange, officers club, recreational services and other facilities officers use.

"There is more to advanced camp than just the formal training," French said. "Part of the training process is seeing the post and what type of life an officer leads."

ONE OF THE major changes in this year's camp is the session has been condensed from six weeks to five weeks, French said.

"They keep us busy, that's for sure," said Michael Rogan, junior in corrections administration.

"If you are not training, you are preparing for it. The camp is a challenge, but nothing anyone can't do," he said. "As long as you keep pushing yourself and keep a good attitude about things you will do all right."

"The part I hate most about the camp is the nights we have to sleep out," Rogan said. "I'm out doing battle with the chiggers and mosquitoes all day, then I have to sleep with them."

ROGAN doesn't have any women in his company, but he said many instructors say women are outdoing many men on field exercises.

Two hundred-ninety eight women are attending this year's camp as compared to 258 last French said. For the first time, women special assistants have been assigned to take care of any problems they may have.

"We have a pretty good idea what the girls are going through because we all graduated last year," said Lt. Cynthia Fountaine, special assistant. "The program has been completely integrated."

There about 12 women in each platoon, Fountaine said. Men and women live in the same barracks, but on separate floors.

"One of the biggest problems cadets face when they come to advanced camp is the change from a college environment to a military environment," Fountaine said. "The college environment is as civilian as you can get. At college you can do whatever you please, then all of the sudden you have people telling you when to get up, when to sleep and when to eat, among other things. It's a big change. You do a lot of growing up at advanced camp."

"It's such a hassle, but it is good training," said Tina Leblond, junior in interior design. "There is so much going on and so much to do. I haven't had time to look at a newspaper in two weeks, so I don't know what is going on in the world."

"I'm getting the opportunity to do things most girls don't even think about," Leblond said. "So far I've thrown a live grenade, fired a machine gun and shot a mortar. The other day I rappelled face first down a cliff and out of a helicopter. I guess you have to learn to conquer your fears. Believe me, I was petrified."

EVEN though women are not allowed in combat, Nixie Woods, junior in business, believes training is beneficial.

I think it is great because you are going to have men as well as women in your command, so you must know what the men went through," Cook said, an M-16 laying across her lap.

"Some things like carrying around a 28-pound machine gun are tough for some of the girls, but overall I think the girls can keep up with the guys."

There are 2,372 cadets from 134 different colleges and universities representing 17 states, Cook said.

"Most of the cadets fulfill their advanced camp requirements between their junior and senior year. However, about 150 cadets have already graduated from college and will be commissioned as army second lieutenants upon the successful completion of the camp," said Capt. Dewey Browder, ROTC information director.

"In order to successfully complete the camp, the cadet must complete at least 85 per cent of all training and achieve certain scores on the mandatory parts of the camp, such as orienteering," Browder said.

"We teach the cadet what to do and then tell him to go out and do it. For example, in survival training, we let loose a bunch of chickens and the cadets must catch and cook the chickens or starve that night."

ONE TRAINING exercise the cadets enjoy is called "scopes," according to Browder. In this exercise, platoons are divided into squads and one squad must attack another's position.

In order to shoot someone, a cadet must look through his rifle scope and call the helmet number of the person he just shot to an observer. Once shot, a person must sit out the rest of the battle and remove his helmet. Blanks and simulated artillery barrages, complete with incoming whistles, add realism to scopes.

"The idea behind the exercise is if you can be seen you can be killed," a platoon leader said.

Like any real war, things do get fouled up. In one instance, a cadet called out "You're dead, 49."

"That's one of our guys, you idiot," another cadet yelled back.

"Disregard that last kill," the first cadet yelled to the observer.

Flood assistance open to students

Students needing aid due to area rains can contact the University Learning Network (ULN) for referral to assistance programs.

Assistance programs have been set up by several campus organizations to aid the students in need and to help students get back on their feet, according to sponsors.

Emergency loans are available from the Student Financial Assistance Office. The Department of Housing has a list of available apartments in the area. The K-State Union Bookstore has text books to loan to students who can't afford to replace their damaged books. The new books can be paid for when students are financially settled again.

Wheat surplus responsible for reduced profits of a major industry like agriculture.

"We've been through these cycles many times, but this one is more severe," he said.

YET THERE is "very little chance" the consumer will see the low grain prices reflected in the cost of groceries, Schruben said.

Klover said he sees an answer to the price problem in reduced wheat plantings.

"We (Kansas Farm Bureau) told farmers last year not to go out and plant acres and acres of wheat, because of the large holdover," Klover said. "The farmer has to realize that wheat is not his big cash crop so he'll look for an alternative to planting wheat from fencerow to fencerow."

"Some farmers took our advice and cut back on their wheat plantings. This is what farmers have to do to get wheat prices back up. They have to look for alternatives."

UNFORTUNATELY, there aren't any good alternative crops for the farmer, Schruben said. He pointed out other grain prices are also depressed.

"In the grain economy, there's a chain effect," he said. "You can't have cheap wheat without affecting the prices of other grains. Their prices are going down, too."

"There are two things we should do to raise the wheat prices," Armstrong said. "We've got to reduce the plant. We've also got to encourage and explore all the markets available, domestic and foreign."

"Carter campaigned on a promise to raise the loan price to $3.50, to make the target price the full cost of production. He's totally reversed this policy. So far, there's no change from the past administration," he said.

SECRETARY of Agriculture, Bob Bergland, is considering a proposal to raise wheat prices by decreasing the amount produced. Under the plan, the government would pay farmers who voluntarily decrease their wheat production by 10 to 15 per cent. Those who didn't participate wouldn't be eligible for government loans. In theory, if enough farmers participated in an acreage setaside program of this type, wheat prices could be brought up.

"The problem is the individual farmer sees himself as such a small part of the total market that he thinks a cutback on his part could have no effect in the price," Schruben said. "They'd rather plant all they want and let other farmers cut back."

"It's very hard to get farmers to act and react together for one goal," Klover said. "They're so independent. We may have to let supply and demand take care of the problem."

Shine arraigned; Aug. 2 trial set

District Court Judge Ron Innes Monday set August 2 as the trial date for accused rapist Roy Shine. Shine, a former K-State defensive tackle, pleaded not guilty in his U.S. district court arraignment to charges that he participated in a gang rape of a K-State co-ed in the athletic dorm on March 30.

If convicted, Shine could face up to 20 years in prison. Shine, 21, from Lynwood, Calif., is free on $3,000 bond.

JERUSALEM — Menahem Begin won a vote of confidence in Israel's newly elected parliament Monday night and was sworn in as the nation's sixth prime minister.

The 63-53 vote on Begin's coalition cabinet capped an election victory for Begin's rightist Likud bloc May 17 that brought an unprecedented change of Israeli leadership after 29 years of Labor party rule.

Begin led the Irgun Zvai Leumi terrorist group during the Jews' fight for independence after World War II. He was sworn in after an eight-hour parliamentary debate in which tempers flared frequently, particularly over Begin's selection of Moshe Dayan as foreign minister.

WASHINGTON — President Carter on Monday threw his support behind a new Senate bill to reduce federal airline regulation, saying it would open up air travel to many Americans who now cannot afford it.

"There is a potential market among Americans for airline service use that hasn't yet been tapped," Carter told a group of 100 airline union officials, many of whom are skeptical about deregulation.

"I believe that more competition, lower rates, high use of airplanes, more entry into new markets, better protection for smaller communities, all tie together in a very worthwhile pursuit," the President said.

The General Accounting Office has estimated the bill would save consumers about $1.5 a year, according to Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., a co-sponsor of the legislation.

TOPEKA, Kan. — Gov. Robert Bennett has declined to appoint a special task force to investigate nursing homes in Kansas but says he personally will take part in a program aimed at improving them.

In a letter to Kansans for Improvement of Nursing Homes, Bennett said he personally will make surprise visits to nursing homes in the weeks ahead as part of the program.

In addition, the governor has directed Robert Harder, secretary of the state Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, and Dwight Metzler, secretary of the state Department of Health and Environment, to put together an advisory committee on nursing homes.

The panel will study problems and propose specific changes in the law prior to the 1978 legislative session which convenes next January.

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — Dr. Christiaan Barnard, South Africa's pioneer heart transplant surgeon, placed a baboon heart into the body of a human Monday night but the recipient died hours after the operation, Groote Schuur hospital announced.

A spokesman said the baboon heart was intended to support the patient's own failing heart in a so-called piggy-back operation. The patient was not identified and the sex was not given.

The operation, in which the baboon heart was implanted next to the patient's diseased heart, was believed to be the first of its kind, the spokesman said.

Doctors at the University Hospital of the University of Mississippi performed a similar operation Jan. 23, 1964, placing the heart of a 96-pound chimpanzee into a 68-year-old man. The patient died an hour after the operation and a medical bulletin said it was "apparent that the heart of the lower primate, at least at the chimpanzee level, is not quite large enough to support the circulatory load of an adult human being." The statement noted there had been successful kidney transplants from chimpanzees to humans.

Death threats greet Brezhnev in Paris

PARIS (AP)—An assassination scare marked the opening hours Monday of Leonid Brezhnev's first mission abroad since he was elected president of the Soviet Union.

Soviet security officials warned their French counterparts an hour before Brezhnev's arrival in Paris of a possible attempt on his life by an assassin equipped with a rifle with telescopic sights, well-informed sources said.

There was also a telephoned claim a bomb had been hidden in the Orly airport terminal, half a mile from the VIP pavilion where Brezhnev was met by President Valery Giscard d'Estaing.

Both reports appeared to stem from hoaxers, but reinforcements were added to the 3,000 French riot police protecting the motorcade route to the Chateau de Rambouillet, 30 miles from the city, as well as the chateau and its vast park.

POLICE searched and sometimes manned buildings along the route and banned all demonstrations in Paris, a ban immediately denounced by extreme rightists.

Officials said the security turnout was the greatest since world heads of state came here in 1970 for the funeral of Gen. Charles de Gaulle.

In a welcoming speech, Giscard d'Estaing spoke of Brezhnev's "personal engagement to detente and the importance you give it in the orientation of Soviet policy."

"Alone in Europe, France and the Soviet Union can give detente its seal of authenticity," Giscard d'Estaing said.

Brezhnev replied he was "sure" that the prime subject of their three meetings, two in private, would be given to "the most acute problem of our time, that of detente and the guarantee of the security of the peoples."

Carter subject to credibility gap

President Johnson was said to have started the credibility gap and after the word was vogue, Presidents Nixon and Ford suffered the same gap.

A credibility gap is said to exist when a President says one thing and then does another.

President Jimmy Carter may become victim to the gap.

DURING the Presidential campaign, Carter spoke out vehemently against the construction of the B1 bomber. Indications now are that he is reconsidering his stance and may give the go-ahead to build the bomber later this month.

Although no one believes Carter will give the go-ahead to build a full fleet of 244 bombers at a cost of $25 billion, many think he'll agree to the construction of 120 planes.

Carter is keeping silent about his decision and intends to make the decision alone after carefully considering the pros and cons.

IF HE decides to okay the project, his opponents will smile, nod and give us all a big "I told you so."

If he nixes the bomber, his supporters will rally around him gloating about his not reverting on a campaign promise.

The issue here should not be whether or not the President goes back on his promise. It should be, do we need the bomber?

Carter has shown, through his careful consideration of the bomber, his willingness to change his mind if the need exists.

This kind of attitude should not be condemned, but condoned. It is comforting to think there is a man in the White House with enough sense to think issues through before making rash decisions.

Advertisers demean women

Television advertisers do not keep up with the times.

In the 1950's, the housewife was portrayed hysterically running around her kitchen and laundry room worrying about spots on her dishes and the whiteness of her clothes. She was immaculately dressed, perfectly coifed and unconcerned about world affairs.

This is 1977, and the television image hasn't changed. Women still giggle with Mr. Whipple about squeezing toilet paper, the mother-in-law or friend still chastizes the housewife for her spotty glasses and, displaying perhaps the worst taste of all, the overwrought husband still suffers from "ring around the collar."

WOMEN are led to believe they should feel guilty if their homes are less-than-spotless and their husbands less-than-perfect.

The women's liberation movement has tried to change some of these demeaning commercials, with very little success. The only ones which, thankfully, are no longer aired are National Airlines' "Fly Me," commercials and those insidious Geritol ads where hubby decides "My wife, I think I'll keep her," because she takes Geritol.

Unfortunately, the advertisers researchers find the ads sell. And what the researchers say is con-committant to a Bible in the advertising industry. Therefore, advertisers are reluctant to change their tunes.

THOSE WHO have tend to go a bit overboard, portraying Dad with an apron, worrying about dinner or how to turn on the washing machine. Rather than putting men and women on equal ground, they seem to think one person must be submissive and one, dominant.

Advertisers don't seem to have their market clearly defined. Only 7 per cent of women today remain in the home in the role of housewife.

Yet, advertisers continue to show us the "little woman" gleefully doing her chores. The image hasn't changed in 20 years, but women have. And women who are offended by these advertising portrayals should boycott the product.

Until women stand up and scream about how they are being projected by television, the myth will continue that women are dumb little things who should be kept barefoot and pregnant and in the kitchen.

Next time you see an ad you think is demeaning, write, scream, yell, at the producer. If the researchers won't listen, maybe the upper echelons in industry will.

Carter's focus on energy

It looks like Jimmy Carter is turning again to his energy program after a month of sporadic Congressional action and delays. Carter himself hasn't been pushing the program as much as he said he would when he called the energy battle the "moral equivalent of war."

Despite his warnings of certain sacrifice, and exhortations that the new energy program may impose hardship on many Americans, Carter has been criticized by legislators as having a bark worse than his bite. If Congress has its way the final draft of the new program will probably be more strict and demanding than his original.

Carter says that's fine. The stricter the better, he says. And despite the death of the gas-guzzler tax and problems with his attempt to regulate natural gas prices, it looks like something resembling Carter's proposal may find its way off Capitol Hill.

ACCORDING to the president's top aid, Hamilton Jordan, Carter wanted to send his widely-publicized program to Congress, let it sit around for a while, let the lawmakers pick at it for a while, and then move in to get the thing passed.

Well, Carter is ready to get going again, his plan has been picked at (and in some cases, ravaged) by lawmakers, but much of the plan is still in committee.

One of the hottest items in the Carter plan has been all but eliminated in the revised version: the gas-guzzler tax. It became all too clear to Congress that gas-guzzlers are made in America and most of the fuel-efficient cars are not. This means foreign car manufacturers would benefit at the expense of U.S. manufacturers, regardless of who makes the better product.

ANOTHER blow to the Carter plan may be his natural gas price regulation. The proposal, now in the House Commerce Committee, has stiff opposition in both the House and the Senate.

A big break came with the approval of Carter's proposal to hike domestic oil prices up to the world price level, from about $5.20 now to about $15 in 1980.

The House also gave the President his Energy Department in the Cabinet, but restricted soon-to-be Secretary of Energy James Schlesinger's power to set prices, and set the department to die in five years unless there is still a need for it.

WHILE Carter didn't dwell on energy during the presidential campaign, he says now that an energy program is his first priority as President.

It's clear that energy is pretty high on the legislator's lists of things to do, also.

And while the House has been subject to minimal lobbying so far, it's likely that proposals such as an industrial shift from gas to oil to coal may bring special interests out of hiding and into the Senate.

All in all, Carter's battle plan for getting his program through seems to be going well. Most of the fights he anticipated, many of the criticisms and rejections he also saw coming. And he is getting tremendous help from heavy-weight leaders such as Speaker Tip O'Neill who are interested in putting a clamp on energy problems while they're still only problems and not crises.

The emphasis of the program, conservation rather than new energy development, will probably survive Congressional editing as well.

It seems both the President and Congress are willing to make enough sacrifices and compromises in the next few months to get a patched-up energy program passed and begun sooner than even Jimmy Carter thought possible.

States not bound to fund abortions

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court, over emotional assents by three members, ruled on Monday that states have no legal duty to pay for abortions when the lives of mothers are not endangered.

The court's majority also ruled that public hospitals cannot be forced to perform abortions for women who want such operations but cannot afford to pay for them.

Garbage collectors deliver porno poll

CLEVELAND (AP) — Denis Bertrand, a supervisor with the city Waste Collection Department, parked his white pickup truck on Esterbrook Street, unpacked a box of 3,200 pornographic questionnaires and dispatched his four co-workers on their morning mission.

"You two older guys take this apartment building right here. Grab a handful of envelopes, grab a handful of questionnaires," Bertrand said, as several residents of the ghetto area watched from their front steps.

Bertrand and the other four, who dutifully began stuffing the forms in mailboxes, were carrying out the first stage of Mayor Ralph Perk's campaign to banish smut from Cleveland by having its citizens come up with a community standard that the courts can use to convict pornographers. The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that pornography be judged under contemporary community standards.

PERK, a Republican seeking his third term this fall, has declared that Cleveland is "under continual siege by the purveyors of pornography." He is having the questionnaires delivered by the garbage supervisors to all the city's 240,000 dwelling units this week and hopes a substantial number of people will fill them out and mail them back.

"I think it's a good idea," said Mrs. Cene Holley, who had a questionnaire delivered to her as she sat on her front steps. "It'll stop a lot of kids ... from getting raped."

"Sure I'm going to send it in," said Shannon Abbey, waving the questionnaire and return envelope that had been handed to her. "I think a person should be able to sell whatever they want to. It's up to the parents to teach their kids what's right."

Some Municipal Court judges who got an advance look at the public questionnaire have said it lacked objectivity, and they would not allow it to be used in obscenity cases in their courts.

Denials of such paid services do not violate the Constitution or the Social Security Act, the court said.

The decision carries great impact for the 300,000 women on welfare who each year seek legal abortions during the first three months of pregnancy. Poor women now will have to seek out free clinics willing to perform the operations or be forced to have their unwanted babies.

ALTHOUGH the court's decision does not bar any state from providing funds for elective abortions, it is politically doubtful whether many will choose to do so.

In its abortion decision, the court upheld Connecticut and Pennsylvania laws banning expenditure of state monies for elective abortions. The court also upheld a St. Louis city ordinance barring the spending of public funds for hospital services to poor women wishing to have an abortion.

The court did not discuss federal funding for abortions but the rationale for its ruling appears to apply to a bill passed by Congress last year — the so-called Hyde amendment — which cut off all federal monies for abortions not needed to save the life of the mother.

A federal court in New York immediately declared the law unconstitutional because it treated poor women unequally.

CONGRESS has been working on a new version of the Hyde amendment, and the measure was approved by the House last week.

It denies federal money for all abortions, even those performed to save the mother's life.

Whether such a blanket denial of welfare aid for poor women could stand constitutional scrutiny was not answered in the court's decision Monday.

"The Constitution imposes no obligation on the states to pay the pregnancy-related medical expenses of indigent women, or indeed to pay any of the medical expenses of indigents," Justice Lewis Powell Jr. said in writing for the majority.

Powell was joined by Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justices William Rehnquist, John Stevens, Potter Stewart and Byron White.

REGISTERING strong dissents were Justices Harry Blackmun,

Thurgood Marshall and William Brennan Jr.

Blackmun, who wrote the court's landmark 1973 decision that declared that governmental interference in a woman's choice to have an abortion cannot be tolerated during the first three months of pregnancy, called the court's decision "punitive and tragic" for "financially helpless" women.

"Implicit in the court's holdings is the condescension that she may go elsewhere for her abortion. I find that disingenuous and alarming, almost reminiscent of 'let them eat cake,'" Blackmun said.

"This is a sad day for those who regard the Constitution as a force that would serve justice to all evenhandedly and, in so doing, would better the lot for the poorest among us," Blackmun added.

Home greenery healthy

Indoor plants still popular

By BARBARA RUST
Collegian Reporter

Many homes, apartments and dorm rooms resemble jungles with a wide assortment of green plants. One might wonder when or if the plant craze will end.

"Our sales in January through May have been normal," said Barbara Saperstein, manager of Pots'n Plants. "In fact, they were slightly higher in May."

"Sales have increased 200 per cent since the end of last summer," said Kevin Smith, department head of plants and pets at Alco. "We have expanded the department and much of the increase is in potting soil, pots and accessories."

PEOPLE buy plants for health reasons, esthetic value and psychological reasons. Plants make the environment healthier by removing dirt, pollutants and giving humidity. People also feel more relaxed around plants, according to Dick Mattson, associate professor of horticulture.

"Plants are not necessarily a luxury, but a necessity," he said. "Architects are designing for plants through the use of skylights, making a home incomplete without green plants."

Green plants are also collected as a hobby because they are easily accommodated in small apartments or dorm rooms. People like to have something to take care of to decorate the room.

"I think it (green plant enthusiasm) was inevitable to come along," Smith said. "Plants were here before we were and people are going back to nature more."

PLANTS are also an inexpensive way to decorate a home. If someone is willing to do some work and propagate his own plants, Smith estimates a good collection could be started for $50 to $75 and $30 yearly to maintain the plants.

"I think it was a fad, but I don't think it will die out," Smith said. "I don't think sales will start to decrease, but it will be a steady and a good market. Green plant sales are different from a fad in that I think they will be here forever. They will just become a way of life."

Nationally, green plants sales are slowing on both coasts, but the Midwest will slow later, Saperstein said. The Midwest usually lags behind the coasts by several months.

GREEN PLANT sales are decreasing because of changing interests in the types of plants people want to grow. Two years ago, green plants were in vogue, but now people want to plant vegetables, Saperstein said.

According to Sue Maes, coordinator of University for Man (UFM) earth classes and UFM director, 21 people signed up for an indoor foliage plants class, but 50 have registered for this summer's gardening class.

"I don't think the demand for the indoor foliage plants class is there like it used to be," she said.

The United States Department of Agriculture (USDA) figures indicate in 1974 and 1975, the ornamental plant industry increased by 65 per cent each year. In 1976, however, the industry grew by 27 per cent.

"I think the increase will be about the same as it was last year, but the USDA estimates a 10 per cent increase," Mattson said. "The amount of increase will taper off in green plants eventually, perhaps by 1978 or 1979."

Farrell offers research aid

Just a telephone call away are the solutions to almost every research problem, states the Farrell Library On-Line Information Retrieval Service.

The service, which assists students, faculty and staff with research projects, operates with two retrieval terminals resembling typewriters. By using a telephone, library staff members contact a computer which contains the appropriate data bank. Key words are then typed in to initiate the search for specific information.

It is the user's responsibility to suggest key words which are neither too narrow nor too broad and to identify the correct data banks to be searched. Once located, the information can be printed as a paper copy to be mailed to the user or as a computer read-out.

"The system does regular library research only much faster," said Richard Rohrer, assistant library director. "One and a half seconds is considered a long search."

Costs for the service vary depending on the extent of service and the data bank used, Rohrer said. Charges are used to cover the time the computer was in use, off-line printing costs and a $2 service charge. Last year the average search cost was $9.50.

The program, in use almost three years, is used mainly by graduate students, Rohrer said.

Budget, realism aid movie

Star-studded 'Bridge' entertaining

By JIM CHALFANT
Collegian Reviewer

"A Bridge Too Far" is one of the latest examples of the current tendency in Hollywood toward overproduction.

It features more top stars than you can count and a lot of large-scale battle scenes. Producer Joseph Levine and Richard Attenborough have done a fine job of re-creating the movie's setting and it seems to be fairly accurate historically.

Overproductions of this sort, however, can be rough on the viewer. Instead of attracting you with finesse and capturing you with an intriguing plot and deep characterizations, "A Bridge Too Far" just knocks you down and runs right over you.

The emphasis is strictly on action in this awesome re-creation of Operation Market Garden, an operation on which the Allies suffered huge losses during World War II. It takes place during the German retreat from Holland, not long after D-Day.

THE FILM cost nearly $30 million to make and you'll be able to see why. The battle scenes are incredible elaborate. In fact, they are probably the only part of the movie's production, besides casting, that is truly memorable.

The film is successful in leaving the viewer with a very disturbing, uneasy feeling. Of course, you can't expect a movie about war to be non-violent, so don't be surprised by a lot of it. You won't leave the theater in a jolly mood.

It may not be well-written, but "A Bridge Too Far" is at least some fine entertainment.

Anytime you have a cast like this one, it's a treat. Maximilian Schell, Liv Ullmann, Robert Redford and Elliot Gould are good in this film. They don't have big parts, but the characters they play are interesting.

The production of the movie is frstrate with some excellent photography and a lot of old tanks and planes to add to the movie's realism. It's a movie that's not hard to follow and the weaknesses in the plot shouldn't stop you from enjoying it.

Beatles' pop, Joplin's jazz revived

By JIM CHALFANT
Collegian Reviewer

Although ragtime almost completely died out as a popular form of music nearly 50 years ago, it is now enjoying a revival.

Ragtime originated in the U.S. in the 1890's and was popular until about the time of World War I. After that, it was virtually unknown.

A few years ago, however, Scott Joplin's piano piece, "The Entertainer," was used in the movie "The Sting" and, ever since, ragtime has been growing. The music of Scott Joplin, considered by many to be the greatest of the ragtime composers, has been the most successful of all.

"James Levine Plays Scott Joplin" is the most recent album of Joplin's music. Levine performs 12 selections, or "rags," as they were called in Joplin's day.

THESE RAGS were originally popular as sheet music. Of course, no one had record players then, so the most popular music was that which people could play themselves.

That's the essence of ragtime. It's not difficult to play and the art involved in it comes more from developing just the right touch than from mastery of the keyboard.

In fact, Joplin's "Maple Leaf Rag," penned in 1899, became the first piece of sheet music ever to sell one million copies. That's really something when you consider one million people were playing it, not just listening to it.

Levine does a fine job of conveying the unique feeling ragtime piano gives. It's very rhythmic, cheerful music with what Joplin referred to as a "weird and intoxicating effect."

"The Entertainer" and "Maple Leaf Rag" are probably the most famous of these rags, all of which were written between 1899 and 1912.

LEVINE shows himself to be a fine pianist in all the album songs, handling masterfully the light, yet steady rhythms, and combining them well with the unexpected bursts of energy characteristic of ragtime.

What is really nice about Levine's treatment of Joplin's music is he played the songs only moderately fast, as the composer stressed they should be played. It seems as though every time I hear someone try and play "The Entertainer," they play it as fast as they can, which is usually too fast. This ruins the beauty of ragtime, reducing it to the level of barroom music of the old West.

If you have any interest in various types of music, and especially in different musical eras, it might be worth listening to "James Levine Plays Scott Joplin." Whether you like it or not, you'll at least hear it as it was meant to be played.

If you listen to only one more album this year, make it "The Beatles at the Hollywood Bowl."

It's their first live one, featuring some of the best concert music you'll hear. There are few bands performing today who even come near the Beatles in musical ability.

The album was recorded at the Hollywood Bowl in the mid-60s with songs ranging from oldies

Shaughnessy leads summer jazz festival

By JIM CHALFANT
Collegian Reviewer

The Manhattan Summer Jazz Festival, Saturday's Arts in the Park feature, was a highlight in this summer's entertainment schedule.

The culmination of a jazz camp held here last week, the festival included the Tonight Show's drummer Ed Shaughnessy, sax player Earl Hesse, trombonist Dave Sporny, trumpeter Jim Sellards, bass player Robert Bowman and pianist Peter Strohm. The K-State Summer Jazz Band, led by Phil Hewett, and the camp band also appeared.

The first few numbers featured the camp band and some of the clinicians, who took turns leading the band and performing with them. Conductor Hesse and soloist Sellards livened things up on the sixth number with "Don't Get Around Much Anymore." Sellard's solo on this song was superb.

ED SHAUGHNESSY came on for the last two numbers before intermission, the first one featuring a fine bass solo by Bowman with Shaughnessy's brilliant drumming setting the tempo for first-rate jazz.

They closed the set with a long number, featuring a drum duet by Shaughnessy and K-State's Allen Carter.

"We'll do it like we didn't rehearse it," Shaughnessy told the crowd.

It was hard to believe him. The duet was excellent — they traded back and forth, started with a slow and simple patterns and built to a dazzling climax. Each was able to pick up on the other's improvisations quickly and they held the audience spellbound for several minutes.

The second half of the concert featured several selections by the K-State summer jazz band, with Hewett conducting and each of the clinicians coming back on stage.

BEFORE the closing music began, Shaughnessy surprised the audience with the announcement he was dedicating a music scholarship to be awarded to the most deserving drummer each year at K-State. Shaughnessy praised student enthusiasm and the music department's dedication here and told the crowd the scholarship would be named not after himself, but after Hewett.

Shaughnessy and Hewett are a fine combination on stage. With Hewett conducting and Shaughnessy on drums, something was added to the performance of the entire band. Even the audience could feel how much fun everyone on stage was having together.

The last selection of the evening was "Sunshine Swing," during which Shaughnessy gave a demonstration of the Indian rhythmic system. He chanted strings of syllables with different rhythmic meanings, then transferred the rhythms to the drums.

Although all appearing at the festival were good, Shaughnessy was definitely the star of the show. His performance was superb and I left looking forward to his next visit to Manhattan.

like "She Loves You" to "Help!"

Some of the songs are great and some are a little bit disappointing. All of them, though, convey to the listener the excitement of a Beatles concert. They put an amazing amount of enthusiasm and energy into their music and it has always been contagious.

OF THE CUTS on Hollywood Bowl, "Roll Over Beethoven," "Ticket to Ride" and "Dizzy Miss Lizzie" are the best. They beat just about anything the Beatles have ever done.

More than anything else, this album shows us how well the Beatles were able to control a crowd. "Twist and Shout" opens the concert and it really fires up the audience. In fact, it will probably fire you up, too.

"Long Tall Sally," one of the best songs to come from the 50s and Little Richard, is the last song they did. It, too, has everyone screaming. It's no wonder the group couldn't even hear what they were singing.

Congratulations should be given to George Martin, producer of Hollywood Bowl. Martin and remixer engineer Geoff Emerick did an excellent job of bringing the album's sound closer to today's standards. The original tapes were done on very primitive equipment and took a great deal of editing and re-mixing.

BUT JUST as bad sound will not ruin this album, the music alone is not what will make it succeed. To me, Hollywood Bowl, is a piece of history — a portrait of four leaders of the great changes in the 60s. If you were in tune to that, you'll be able to get a lot out of this album. It made me get out all my old Beatle albums and enjoy them more than ever.

Like any music, not everyone will appreciate it. Those who don't remember the impact of the Beatles on the entire music industry might not. A lot of people won't see why this concert was so much more than a night at Royal's Stadium with Peter Frampton or Fleetwood Mac.

For the people who have been following the Beatles from The Ed Sullivan Show to Abbey Road, but have never seen them on stage, this album will nearly make up for it. And if you were lucky enough to have seen them, it will bring back more memories than a Beatle reunion ever could.

"Those who clamour for a Beatle reunion cannot see that it can never be the same again," wrote George Martin on the back of the album.

He's right. John, Paul, George and Ringo haven't played together for seven years and they've moved in different directions. We've changed as well. The excitement and meaning that was Beatlemania cannot be revived in a reunion, but it can be with Hollywood Bowl. And it was worth waiting for.

Amin gone again; search launched

NAIROBI, Kenya (AP)—A Kenyan newspaper report that Idi Amin was missing following a weekend assassination attempt touched off a new round of hide-and-go-seek Monday with the unpredictable Ugandan leader. Ugandan officials dismissed the report in the Nairobi Daily Nation as inaccurate but would not say where Amin was. An unidentified man who answered the telephone at Amin's home told the Associated Press "we don't know where he is and nobody has any explanation."

The man, who seemed nervous and frightened, said a large number of Moslems surrounded the house after Amin—a member of the country's Moslem minority—failed to return home Friday evening.

"We don't know what has happened to him," the man said. "We've tried in vain to find him. We don't know where he is, and nobody has any explanation."

HE SAID searchers had gone to Murchison Falls in northwestern Uganda "to look for Amin."

The state-controlled Radio Uganda said earlier Monday that Amin might attend a "refugee day" celebration in northwestern Uganda. Later broadcasts made no mention of a celebration.

The last official report on Amin's whereabouts came Saturday when Radio Uganda reported he was presented with a giant fish caught in Lake Victoria by his British-born aide, Bob Astles. A spokesman for Astles said he was "on safari."

The flood of '77; for many a painful, bitter remembrance

It's something you never think about until it happens to you.

Last Friday night, an intense thunderstorm poured almost seven inches of rain on southern Riley county. Ogden, lying lower than Manhattan, was subject to the worst of the storm. With water rising faster than it ever has before, the Seven Mile Creek ran its banks and flooded most of the town.

By Saturday morning, even as some were still asleep, rescue and evacuation efforts were getting underway. By that afternoon, more than 200 Ogden families had signed in with the Red Cross relief station at the Ogden Elementary School.

One child woke his father, remarking, "Look, Dad, it rained an ocean outside."

TO THE HUNDREDS affected by the disaster, it might as well have been an ocean. The property damage in Ogden alone is estimated at more than $1 million. Seven trailers were destroyed, falling into the creek. Several others were heavily damaged.

With the National Guard on the scene to prevent looting, the slow clean-up process began as soon as the water receded enough to let workers and equipment into the disaster area.

For Ogden, under a 7 p.m. curfew and with many of its residents evacuated, federal assistance money was sought for the flood victims by Kansas Gov. Robert Bennett.

Statistically, it was the heaviest rain in the area's history and the most rain received in any 24-hour period.

MANY OGDEN RESIDENTS, embittered by heavy property losses, cast the blame for the flooding on a recently-constructed highway bypass to I-70. They say the new route restricted the natural flow of the floodwaters and forced the water into the trailer park rather than out. Ironically, the highway which was bypassed by the new route, K-18, was flooded and closed in the middle of Ogden.

Fortunately, there were no serious injuries, either Ogden or Manhattan, as police and local citizen groups were quick to respond to the emergency and assist families in the flood area.

Manhattan fared better in the storm. While Wildcat Creek in the west overflowed, damages were kept to a minimum. Manhattan was also aided by runoff systems which allowed the water to escape quickly and do less harm.

Many Ogden residents had more to worry about than returning the next day to start their cars. For some families, all that was left to be salvaged from their homes could fit in a rowboat. For others, there was the trip back to the trailer to look for their insurance policies before they could know exactly how bad the storm would affect them.

Energy plans prompt local concern

By CINDY STEARNS
Collegian Reporter

Because of Carter's recent energy conservation proposals, K-State and local reactions are ones of concern.

"After Carter's proposal, car sales have definitely been hurt," said Ed Schram of Manhattan's Ed Schram Dodge.

"Most people don't know what to buy," he said. "They are holding off to see what's going to happen."

Right now none of Schram's cars gets less than 18 miles to the gallon on the road. The cars will be down-sized next year and should get between 26 and 30 miles to the gallon, he said.

An alternative to gasoline currently being worked on is gasahol — alcohol made from wheat, corn or milo mixed with gasoline, said Martha Keys, congressman for Kansas' second district.

An experiment at the University of Nebraska is testing gasahol. According to Keys' newsletter, state cars in Nebraska will be driven two million miles on gasahol. So far, the cars have gotten five per cent better mileage than cars using non-leaded fuel after 1.7 million miles.

THE CARS have performed equally well as cars using 100 per cent gasoline, and no abnormal or unusual wear or deterioration on any of the engine parts has been reported.

K-State also has a project involving gasahol under the direction of Dick Hayter, assistant professor of mechanical engineering.

K-State's engineering department is working with solar, wind and coal projects, said Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering.

Wind power is one of the larger energy alternatives in Kansas. Gary Johnson, associate professor of electrical engineering, is working with the five-kilowatt wind machine located two miles north of campus.

ANOTHER project which will effect a large portion of Kansas and possibly K-State is the Jeffery's Energy Center located north of Belleville.

The center is a coal-fired electricity generation plant, said Dean Eckhoff, professor of nuclear engineering.

When the center is completed, 40 per cent of Kansas will be using it. The center is funded mainly by Kansas Power and Light Co. and Kansas Gas and Electric Co., Eckhoff said.

K-State is investigating the possibility of using the wasted heat from the center. By an insulated pipeline, the used heated water would replace the steam K-State uses now. The chilled water system operating in the summer would also use the same system, Eckhoff said.

"If K-State used this energy there would be increased efficiency, same or less cost than a coal plant and a little bit cleaner," Eckhoff said.

MOST of K-State's physics department's projects are basic research, said Basil Curnutte, professor of physics.

Two of the major projects funded outside the University involve solar energy, Curnutte said.

JARVIN EMERSON, professor of economics, said the gradual shifts to alternative fuel sources will not endanger the national economy.

"Magnitudes and directions (involving alternate sources) are not entirely clear yet," Emerson said. Electricity with coal and nuclear power and the coal gasification plant under consideration in Wichita are examples of alternatives.

Short-term programs in which K-State is involved are energy conservation projects. The long-term plans must include government incentive along with the technology and money invested in the project, which at present are not there, Emerson said.

"K-State is about average. We have not taken a big leadership role in developing alternative energy sources," Eckhoff said.

ALTHOUGH not all Democrats go along with all of Carter's proposals, said Bob Littrell, Riley County Democratic Chairman, "there's only so much oil on earth and you can only use it once."

He disagrees with Ronald Reagan who said there is no energy shortage in an article from the June 3 Kansas City Times. "We're not running out of anything except confidence in ourselves," Reagan said.

"The public doesn't want to face the problem" of the energy situation, said Donn Everett, Kansas Senator.

"I personally support the President's proposal," Everett said. "The Republican alternative is about how the Democrat's feel about it."

Youth group asks K-State to rejoin

EDITORS NOTE: This is the first of a two-part story on the National Student Association.

By SHEREE LOWE

The conclusion of World War II marked the beginning of many things, from baby booms to world youth organizations.

In the midst of the post-war youth groups was the National Student Association (NSA), a Central Intelligence Agency (CIA)-affiliated group of which K-State was a member.

NSA, after going bankrupt in 1967, is currently rebuilding itself and member schools have asked K-State to rejoin with the assurance that all NSA monies are from dues and memberships.

The International Union of Students was formed in 1946 to serve as a communicating unit for should be student governments rather than individuals or other youth groups.

Besides the goal of international representation, NSA supported the concept of improved communication among member student governments.

Soon after the 1947 convention, K-State joined the group as a continuing member. Following the 1949 National Student Congress, however, the (then) K-State Student Council voted to no longer pay dues to NSA because the organization had no programs which benefitted the K-State student body. Included in the council's withdrawal letter was the idea that when NSA did offer better ideas and services to member schools, K-State would reconsider membership.

DURING THESE early years, NSA struggled along with little financing other than dues and (See FORMER, page 6) the various national unions of students over the world. This caused some alarm in the United States for, while feeling ran high that American students should attend, there was not a U.S. national union of students to send representatives.

SEVERAL YOUTH organizations including the Methodist Youth Fellowship and the United States Youth Council submitted nominees from whom the delegates were selected.

The delegates quickly realized upon their arrival in Prague, Czechoslovakia, it would be little more than a propaganda war between the East and West.

The Americans believed their lack of organization was detrimental to their efforts when compared with the well-ordered groups from most of the European countries. The need for a national organization to carry on a continuing representation at all international youth meetings was recognized.

AS A RESULT of the students' efforts, the National Student Association was formed at a constitutional convention in the summer of 1947 at the University of Wisconsin, with representatives from over 200 student governments present. It was decided in preliminary meetings the constituency of the organization

Students, instructors expect more from summer school

If summer spells classes and studying for you, you're not alone. Whether it's out of necessity or because home doesn't offer much excitement during the summer, about 3,800 K-State students spend much of their summer in a classroom.

Ellsworth Gerritz, dean of admissions and records, believes many students attend summer school in order to graduate early or to pick up extra hours. "A few of our students take courses just to take them," Gerritz said. Whatever their reason, 5,000 students are expected to enroll in K-State's summer school program before enrollment closes. "Summer school presents an opportunity for personal and academic development," Earl Nolting, dean of students, said.

PERSONAL DEVELOPMENT is important, he said. A student takes courses that will please him, and as a result he participates more actively in class. According to Gerritz, it takes a special student to attend summer school. He listed three reasons why:

- Motivation of the student is higher; it requires a little bit extra.
- Smaller classes and closer teacher-student relationships.
- Interaction of small groups and competition can lead to better performances. Better performances means better grades. Why summer school? "Because my hometown is so boring and because I needed it," Debra Royse, junior in chemical engineering, said. "Well, I got a job in Manhattan and I knew I'd be bored, so why not?" one student said. "I needed some hours to graduate and I didn't feel like going home. Also, I'd get to know a few people better," said Jane Bichelmeyer, senior in social work. "I needed it and also I'll gain a whole semester by going," Dave Nelson, senior in architecture, said. GRADES ARE another aspect of summer school and average about the same during the summer as they do in the school year. Kenneth Lewallen, instructor of Black American history, said. Lewallen said he expects more from his students because there is less time to cover the same amount of material. "A person has to work harder to put out the same amount of work," he said. "Students tend to be better than usual or worse than usual. There are a few academics and then there are those who need to catch up," Harold Shaver, assistant professor of journalism, said. "Students don't suffer more in the summer than they do in the fall."

Keys, Erwin, Bond to speak at Student Rights Conference

Julian Bond, Sam Ervin and Martha Keys have been tentatively scheduled as keynote speakers for the fourth annual Student Legal Rights Conference to be sponsored by the Student Governing Association and the Division of Continuing Education in October. Bond, a U.S. Senator from Georgia and Ervin, a former U.S. Senator from North Carolina who was chairman of the Senate Watergate Committee, will speak on legal rights, emphasizing constitutional rights pertaining to college students.

WASHINGTON — Consumer prices went up last month at a slower pace than in April and the Carter administration said Tuesday it expects further improvements in the pace of inflation in the coming months.

The Labor Department reported prices rose six-tenths of 1 per cent in May, down from April's eight-tenths per cent pace, as the rise in food prices moderated.

"We consider that improvement to be good," said White House Press Secretary Jody Powell. "We expect to see further improvement in the coming months."

But the Republicans saw it differently, with GOP Chairman Bill Brock calling the price report "more devastating news" and said the figures showed "galloping inflation again in the month of May."

Prices increased 4.8 per cent in all of 1976, but surged at an annual rate of nearly 10 per cent during the first quarter of this year. Prices rose at a 8.4 per cent annual rate in the latest three months.

WASHINGTON — The Food and Drug Administration announced Tuesday it intends to prohibit the sale of all nonprescription daytime sedatives.

FDA Commissioner Donald Kennedy also said he has instructed the National Cancer Institute to speed up testing of a widely used antihistamine which an independent study indicates may be linked to liver cancer. The antihistamine, methapyrilene, is a major ingredient in daytime sedatives, sleep aids and most cough and cold remedies.

"Users of these products run the risk of being drowsy during the day, when they may be operating automobiles or other dangerous machines and need to be alert," said Kennedy.

DENVER — Hitchcock would love it, but local joggers find the situation strictly for the birds.

The culprits are grackles who make dive-bombing swoops at every jogger who passes Park Hill Golf Course.

"If we did it five time a day, they'd attack us five times a day," said Helen Wright, who jogs daily near the course with her husband.

"It's crazy," said Marcus Walker, who's taken to carrying a stick to fend off his attackers. "It's really scary."

No one is sure why the birds attack, but a spokesman at the Denver Zoo said they may be trying to protect nests.

WIMBLEDON, England — Jimmy Connors ignored the boos and hisses of British tennis fans Tuesday and easily won his first match in the Wimbledon tournament, untroubled by his injured thumb.

Meanwhile, in the women's bracket, top-seeded Chris Evert began defense of her title with an easy 6-0, 6-3 triumph over American Ruta Gerulaitis.

The booing the top-seeded Connors received when he stepped onto center court was believed unprecedented from the normally sedate fans at Wimbledon. It followed Connors' failure to take part in a Parade of Champions Monday to celebrate the centenary of the world's most famous tennis tournament.

MORRIS PLAINS, N.J. — Karen Anne Quinlan, who has lingered in a coma since her parents won the right to turn off the machinery they thought was keeping her alive, was in deteriorating health and near death Tuesday night.

The last rites of the Roman Catholic Church were administered at the Morris View Nursing Home here, a family attorney said.

The attorney, Paul Armstrong, said Miss Quinlan, 23, was deteriorating rapidly and that her death was only a matter of time.

'Circus' provides music, dance

The "Moving Circus" is in Manhattan, but it's no ordinary circus.

The 15-member group is a music and dance ensemble. Its 10 dancers include former K-State instructors, a graduate teaching assistant, K-State students and a Manhattan High School student. The five band members are local musicians, including three K-Staters.

"Moving Circus came about by people who were interested in dance and music working together," Pam Ross, former K-State instructor and member of Moving Circus, said.

"Moving Circus is a vehicle for Pam and me and everyone else involved in the group to express themselves publicly," said Ben Carriel, percussionist.

MOVING CIRCUS' emphasis is on modern dance and some of their choreography is performed with musical scores.

"Modern dance has no point shoes or shoes usually ever," Ross said. "It's usually a dance that is fairly abstract. It emphasizes dynamics and shapes."

The group has been practicing five nights a week since the end of last semester. They performed May 21 at Arts in the Park and, performed on June 16 for the Governor's office in Topeka before a crowd of more than 200 in front of the Capitol. Moving Circus is only the second group asked to perform for the Governor's office this year.

INCLUDED IN their repertoire are two dance numbers choreographed by Ross, "Standing Room Only," performed without music, and "Pool." Carriel composed the music for "Pool." Both numbers have been performed previously by the K-State Dance Workshop, with which Madeline Cantor, K-State instructor of modern dance and Moving Circus member, and Ross assisted.

The group hopes to get their performances filmed and expose them to other people.

Poor planning causes overlap

Even though the fire is out, and the smoke is cleared, the question of why the overlap of the spring intersession and summer school lingers.

The peculiar part of the situation is that the Administration didn't realize someone had scheduled summer school classes in classrooms while the intersession classes were still in session. The faculty and students noticed the problem.

It is not a very pretty picture when a student is trying to take a test in his or her intersession class, and during the middle of it strangers start strolling in.

The instructor asks them if he can help, with the strangers replying, "Oh, well, summer school started today and this is our classroom." How could anyone finish a test when someone else is trying to take over the room?

ANYWAY, I've got a suggestion. Summer school ends July 29 and the fall semester starts one month later. Why couldn't we just delay summer school one week so everyone can get started at the same time? Students and faculty will still have time to work or go on vacation when summer school is over.

I feel pretty fortunate to have missed only two days of summer school, at least I was able to catch up on what I missed. Some are just now trying to catch up because they missed the first week.

I thought intersession was to be a way to pick up a couple of hours between the end of the spring semester and the beginning of summer school, without trouble. Guess I was wrong, wasn't I?

And now for the news...

"And to recap the news for our mentally impaired readers:

Carpenter Fish, director of the Riley County Nautical Society, today proposed purchasing four nuclear submarines to be used during the rainy season in Manhattan.

"Carp", as he is known to his friends, said the submarines would be used to transport people when more than three inches of rain falls during a rain storm. Carp said a "sub-stop" would be located every two blocks along Poyntz avenue and would travel north and south, depending upon the current.

Manhattan Mayor Po Dunk, when asked what he thought of the proposal, commented, "Carp's all wet."

FISH ALSO announced that all those interested in becoming submarine skippers should report Tuesday to the City Pool at 1900 hours.

In other city developments, Fire Commissioner Fyre Berns today announced his resignation from the Riley County Fire department.

Berns cited a flaming controversy over contract negotiations between the city and the firefighters as his reason for resignation.

"I'll admit it," Berns said, "I've met my match. Things were getting too hot."

Mentioned as a possible successor to Berns is Harold Kindle. The flaming red-head is a graduate from the Mrs. O'Leary School of Firefighting in Chicago and is reported to have a burning desire to be appointed the new commissioner.

AND, our "Man in the Street", Rocky Rhode, is reported to be in satisfactory condition after his serious accident yesterday.

While interviewing Riley County Police Chief I.N. Ferrior, reportedly discussing alcohol abuse among younger people, Rhode was struck by a four-ton

Apparently, Rhode took his job too seriously and actually conducted his interviews while standing in the street.

Coors truck which was enroute to Aggieville.

Because the truck was delayed, numerous riots were reported at a number of taverns in Aggieville.

AND IN sports, the Manhattan Indians yesterday battled the Abilene Cowboys for the Kansas Class 3.5 A track title.

Led by double-winner Fleet of Foot, who ran away with the 100 and 220, the Indians easily massacred the Cowboys, 135-10.

The Cowboys' only win came in the shot put where Strong Armz tossed the shot 76'10". This would have been a world record had it not been wind-aided.

And the weatherman is today calling for help. It seems his arthritic grandmother died yesterday and he is no longer able to predict the weather. He did say it would be light today with a chance of darkness creeping in later in the day. He also said there is no chance of snow or sleet in Manhattan in the outlook.

Portions of the preceeding broadcast were fictitious.

Letters to the editor

Resent 'dumping ground' attitude

Editor,

We agree with Kim Washington that the illiteracy of incoming freshmen is shocking, but as graduates of Hutchinson Community Junior College we find the suggestion that junior colleges serve as the dumping ground for the illiterate of Kansas disgusting.

Students of such low caliber should not be allowed to occupy seats in any institution of higher learning including junior colleges.

Many capable students attend jocos for a variety of reasons including financial considerations, the desire to take advantage of special technical curricula, and the desire to ease the transition from a small high school atmosphere to that of a large university.

Washington's thoughtless comment about the junior colleges of Kansas, which casts aspersions on the quality of their course work and therefore their graduates, illustrates the fact that the illiterate do not have a monopoly on ignorance.

Abortion not a right

Editor,

This response is to Kay Coles editorial "Abortion is an individual right." Her statement, "A woman is a person and a person should be able to do with her body as she pleases," is not true. A woman has the right to protect her life, not take hers or anyone else's life.

Abortion as a protection to the mother's life in a complicated pregnancy may be condoned. However, abortion as a means of birth control to avoid the problems of being pregnant or the responsibilities of raising a child is not right.

We should not forget that there are numerous adoption agencies and most importantly there is a human life at stake.

Haldeman enters prison; Mitchell to surrender today

H.R. Haldeman, the second most powerful man in Richard Nixon's White House, went to prison Tuesday.

He walked into the gates at the federal minimum security facility at Lompoc, Calif., at 5 p.m. EDT, the Bureau of Prisons reported.

Haldeman reported for his confinement a day ahead of schedule. He and former Atty. Gen. John Mitchell had been ordered to surrender to prison officials by June 22.

Mitchell planned to report to the federal facility at Maxwell Air Force Base near Montgomery, Ala., Wednesday morning, his lawyer said.

BOTH MEN are under a 2½-to-8 year prison sentence for their part in the Watergate cover-up.

Never before have men who held such great national political power gone to prison: Haldeman, the man who ran the Nixon White House, a convicted perjurer; Mitchell, the first attorney general in history to be convicted of criminal acts.

By reporting early, Haldeman apparently tried to avoid reporters, but newsmen were on the scene.

Haldeman was the 24th man caught in the Watergate web to enter prison. Mitchell will be the 25th and probably the last.

FOR HALDEMAN, it was exactly 28 months from the day

K-State team wins engineering contest

A team of K-State engineers which developed an alternate system for providing electrical energy for a Kansas farm home was the Grand Prize winner of the 1977 Student Competition on Relevant Engineering (SCORE).

The K-State entry was a Savonius wind machine and an engine powered by ethanol produced from Kansas grain sorghum. It beat over 56 other collegiate entries.

"We met the load curve required perfectly on Sunday," said Lee McQueen, senior in mechanical engineering. "We were the only people producing energy on Sunday (the day of the first 24-hour test). We were producing more than anyone else. All others had to run their tests Tuesday."

GARY JOHNSON, faculty adviser, who helped with the wind machine, said the machine is now in the dairy barns where it will continue to be the subject of research for a few years. If evaluations prove successful, Johnson said he foresees many applications for the wind machine.

The SCORE contest required students to design a system to develop 20 kilowatt hours of electricity in a 24-hour period and meet a 2.5 kilowatt peak load at a specified time. All 57 entries were judged on design, economy, marketability, performance and innovation.

he, Mitchell and domestic aide John Erlichman were sentenced by U.S. District Judge John Sirica.

No one was closer to Nixon, the fallen president, than these two men. Mitchell had been Nixon's law partner and the director of his two successful presidential campaigns. Haldeman had worked in Nixon campaigns since 1956, devoting himself to the task so completely that people said if Nixon hadn't had a Haldeman, he would have had to invent one.

American negotiator optimistic about British air agreement

LONDON (AP) — In a dramatic last-minute turnabout, the chief American negotiator at the U.S. British air transportation talks said Tuesday night "chances are extremely good" for a new agreement.

He made the optimistic prediction only hours after U.S. Transportation Secretary Brock Adams said in Washington that most scheduled airline service between the United States and Britain probably would end Wednesday morning.

Failure of the two nations to reach a new commercial air agreement could disrupt vacation and business plans for thousands of air travelers.

Ambassador Alan Boyd, who heads the U.S. negotiating team in London, told reporters, "While a few important issues remain, there is the strongest possibility the deadline will be met and air services will continue without disruption." He gave no details of the breakthrough.

Boyd made his statement during last-ditch talks to try and beat the deadline of 12:01 EDT Wednesday, when the 31-year-old Bermuda pact would expire.

A shutdown would affect the scheduled flights of Pan American World Airways, Trans World Airlines, National Airlines and British Airways. It would not involve chartered airline flights or the scheduled flights of other airlines that fly between the two countries, such as Air India, Iranair and El Al.

Police, FBI maintain searches for criminals

By DIXIE HOLMES
Collegian Reporter

But what about the ones that get away?

What happens when a crime is committed and the offender isn't caught? The Riley County Police Department (RCPD) doesn't forget about them.

If the initial search following the crime isn't successful, the police continue to canvass the area, re-interview principal witnesses, develop artist sketches of the suspect(s) and follow all obvious leads.

"We kind of go into a holding pattern," said John LaFond, RCPD inspector. "We look into any other similar cases in the area, follow up reports of people matching the description given and put out periodic alert bulletins to remind patrolmen we are still looking for these offenders."

The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) enters on cases of federal jurisdiction such as bank robbery or kidnapping.

AFTER THE March 23 robbery of the Westloop branch of the Union National Bank, several FBI agents were called in. They worked with the entire RCPD investigative force and several state policemen to form a force of over 20 investigators, LaFond said. Currently, six county investigators are continuing the search for the robber.

"The seriousness of the case dictates the number of people assigned on the case," LaFond said. "We assign as many men as we have to at the time. If we need more, we can get more."

The success rate for catching offenders is about 70 per cent for robberies and nearly 100 per cent for homicides and manslaughter cases, LaFond said.

Thefts generally have the lowest clearance rate because they constitute the majority of crimes committed in Riley County.

occasional contributions. As a result little was accomplished in terms of programs or positions.

The school year 1952 to 1953 was a pivotal one for NSA. In an attempt to find funding for student trips to the world youth conferences, the NSA leadership was introduced to men who later were found to be CIA agents.

An agreement was developed whereby the CIA would finance most of NSA's foreign projects and, in turn, the NSA travelers would file reports which were made available to the CIA. Evidence has since found only the NSA president, the NSA international affairs vice-president and several key foreign representatives of the organization were knowledgeable of NSA's relationship with the CIA.

DURING the first 10 years of its existence, NSA did little in providing services or in making position statements. From 1957 to 1958, NSA started positions designed to make itself a coordinator on various campuses from the junior colleges to the graduate schools. This was the era of early civil rights work and positions endorsing desegregation and scholarships for blacks were made.

MORE CONSIDERATION to the role of student government in universities was the issue in 1959, while 1960 to 1961 were years devoted to making students realize responsibilities to themselves and the community in which they lived.

NSA entered a controversial era in 1962 with the passage of positions concerning the federal government's civil rights role and cooperation with the civil rights movements in the south.

New NSA programs for students began in 1964. With solicitation and detailed proposals having been submitted, public government agencies like the Office of Education granted funds for student-related projects.

In February of 1967, the NSA-CIA tie became public knowledge.

Bell plans better telephone service

Imagine you have placed a telephone call and received a busy signal.

Instead of calling the number again yourself, an automatic callback system takes note of the busy signal, waits until the line is clear and then dials your number and the number you called and connects the two lines.

This is just one of the services the stored-program controlled (SPC) network, created by a panel of Bell Telephone engineers, may make possible by the 1980s.

Plans for the system were revealed at the International Conference on Communications in Chicago June 15.

OTHER SERVICES the SPC network may provide include:

—Identification of priority callers by means of distinctive ringing from calls from preselected numbers.

—Pre-selection of telephone numbers from which collect calls could be accepted without operator assistance.

The SPC network will also decrease the time necessary to connect long-distance callers. A caller from New York may be connected to a party in Los Angeles in as fast as two seconds.

According to S.J. Barbera, panel chairman, implementation of the SPC network will involve a major, long-term technical effort, including installation of electronic switching systems in thousands of Bell System telephone central offices throughout the nation.

Answer to yesterday's puzzle.

Prison standards to be established

WASHINGTON (AP) — In a major push for prison reform, Atty. Gen. Griffin Bell is preparing the first government guidelines defining acceptable living conditions in federal and state prisons and jails.

He hopes to announce the national standards by Sept. 1 and may seek additional federal funds to help states comply.

Bell said he has ordered department officials, under the direction of Deputy Atty. Gen. Peter Flaherty, to develop guidelines on a minimum acceptable level for prison living conditions.

THE STANDARDS would deal with the overcrowded conditions that have plagued most state prison systems during this decade and would set goals for regular maintenance and repairs of prison facilities, staffing and operations, medical treatment and other services to inmates.

"I think the Department of Justice owes it to the nation to come up with some kind of practical standard that we can live by and that the states can live by," he asserted. "This would be the attorney general taking a position as to what we think the standards ought to be. Once we take that position, then people will know how to conform their conduct."

BELL SAID he has discussed the plan "very generally" with President Carter and that "it's possible" additional federal money would be given the states to improve prison systems.

The attorney general stressed the standards would be voluntary. "We wouldn't try to enforce it. It would be a suggestion."

Unemployment rate drops in Kansas

TOPEKA (AP) — The unemployment rate in Kansas during May dropped to 3.3 per cent, down from last month and May of last year, Gov. Robert Bennett announced Tuesday. The May unemployment rate nationally was 6.4 per cent, almost twice that of Kansas. The Kansas rate in April was 3.5 per cent and one year ago the rate was 3.8 per cent.

May employment was 1,071,600 an increase of 21,600 over April and 17,900 higher than one year ago.

He said he launched the project because he was concerned about the increasing number of lawsuits charging state prison officials with cruel and unusual punishment and civil rights violations.

Several federal courts have ordered drastic reforms after concluding that inmates were forced to live in cells crowded far beyond capacity, with broken toilets, poor food and little, if any, exercise.

IN THE MOST recent case, a federal judge in Oklahoma ruled that overcrowded conditions at the state prison in McAlester and the state reformatory in Granite amounted to cruel and unusual punishment.

Bell said the Justice Department should attempt to conciliate complaints about prison conditions and the national standards thus are a necessary yardstick. "If we're going to conciliate . . .," he said, "we're going to have to know where we want to go."

Wheat utilization milling center plans still only tentative

By DIXIE HOLMES
Collegian Reporter

Plans for the establishment of a wheat milling and utilization center in Manhattan are still only tentative, said Charles Deyoe, head of the Department of Grain Science and Industry.

Deyoe returned this week from meetings in Denver which followed-up a meeting held in Manhattan last May to discuss the planned center.

If the milling center is established, its general objectives would be to provide technical and marketing assistance to agencies in other country and regional programs throughout the world. This would include providing training courses, seminars and conferences for wheat marketing agencies and the Foreign Agriculture Service (FAS).

THE CENTER would be operated by K-State and the American Institute of Baking (AIB), which plans to have its national headquarters moved from Chicago to Manhattan by November.

"All the publicity has really been too early," Deyoe said. "First, we have to draft a proposal and then submit it for approval to all the major regional wheat groups before we can even begin securing funds."

The proposal is expected to be met with some disapproval by North Dakota state wheat officials who have already expressed concern that a wheat center in Kansas would affect their ongoing programs with spring and durum wheats.

ACCORDING TO Deyoe, the meeting in Denver was held to partially "iron-out" such difficulties.

"We want it to be a total United States wheat promotion center. We don't intend to exclude anyone," he said.

Present at the Denver meeting were representatives of the North Dakota state wheat commission, North Dakota State University, FAS, Great Plains Wheat, Inc., Western Wheat Associates, AIB, the Kansas and Oklahoma wheat commissions, Old West Regional Commission and the Ozarks Regional Commission.

If established, the first course the center would probably offer would be one requested by a Japanese milling association, Deyoe said.

"Before we can begin planning things like that, there are really two jobs to be done," Deyoe said. "We need to secure initial funding and then establish a successful program to secure long-term funding."

DEYOE FORESEES no need for new facilities.

"If the program developed accordingly, we might need additional space, but it would be a question of allocating already existing space at K-State and the AIB building," he said.

Commissions expressing an interest in funding the center are the Ozarks Regional Commission and the Old West Regional Commission.

Although Deyoe said chances were good for approval of Manhattan as the location of the wheat milling and utilization center, he declined to speculate when the final decision would be made.

Organization seeks credibility after CIA tie revealed

EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the second of a two-part story dealing with the National Student Association.

By SHEREE LOWE
Collegian Reporter

Upon disclosure of its CIA affiliation, the National Student Association (NSA) had to focus on legitimate public funding which ultimately led to bankruptcy.

Prior to 1968, K-State was an active member of NSA. In August of that year, the annual meeting of the NSA Congress was held in Manhattan in Weber Arena. There are many different accounts of what occurred at the conference.

"Widely diverse in its membership and vague in its aims, the National Student Association is a loose affiliation of 368 student governments that has never held any real power on U.S. college campuses, said Time magazine.

"Its main accomplishment has been to act as a sounding board for the whole spectrum of student complaints. Its annual congress in Manhattan, Kan., last week served the same purpose. And the decibel count at the meeting signaled the almost certain approach of another year of collegiate unrest and uproar. The dominant issue was what the delegates called 'the white problem,' Time said.

"At last week's NSA congress meeting held in Manhattan, Kan., hundreds of undergraduates stood and cheered when a senior from the University of Hawaii borrowed a cigarette lighter and, hands trembling, burned his draft card," said Newsweek. "They passed a resolution condemning the 'aggression of the U.S. Government against people of Vietnam' and they burned dollar bills in a put-down of middle-class values."

THE CONGRESS was not all politics. It also offered "touchy-feely" sensitivity training. Six strangers sat in a circle in a dimly-lit room and tried to understand each other and create group solidarity using words and touch. Some students played a drug bust game, pretending they were the various parties in a drug arrest, Newsweek said.

At one point in the proceedings, 24 members of a "guerilla theater" marched into the arena in chain gang fashion, pretending to beat themselves to atone for their guilt as racists. "It hurts so good," they cried, climaxing the skit with a shout of "liberation" and the chant "organize, work to survive."

The NSA Congress rang with radical rhetoric. "I find no more honorable thing to be in modern America than a criminal," said David Harris, former Stanford University student body president, who is now appealing a three-year sentence for turning in his draft card.

TOM HAYDEN, leader of demonstrations in Chicago, urged students "to hook up with everyone with the crazy feeling

With eyes on their instructor, these high school twirlers watch intently as they learn a new step. The twirlers are on campus for a twirlers camp, one of the many activities taking place this summer.

Acker issues organization list

In response to an allegation that members of K-State's faculty were using University office space and funds to promote the interests of private lobbying groups, K-State President Duane Acker was asked by Attorney General Curt Schneider last spring to submit a list of the organizations on campus using office space and personnel.

Acker, in a press conference Wednesday, released the list of 66 organizations housed on campus which was sent to Schneider in May.

Acker noted in his letter to Schneider the organizations were ones for which K-State faculty serve as officers and "are groups through which we can carry out our educational mission as a land-grant university."

"With space at a premium, we must function consistent to the education goal," Acker said, referring to the use of space by the organizations.

Acker said he had questions about some of the organizations listed, but did not specify which ones.

Schneider has not yet released an opinion about the use of the facilities on campus.

Summer student directory available

A directory of summer school students will be available from the Collegian distribution racks in the Union this afternoon.

The directory is published by Student Publications, Inc., and is distributed without charge.

Copies also will be placed at other on-campus distribution points Friday morning, and will be available at the Student Publications office in Kedzie Hall.

Korean CIA chief reveals payoffs

WASHINGTON (AP) — Testifying under heavy guard, South Korea's former intelligence chief said Wednesday that his government bankrolled attempts to buy the support of U.S. congressmen.

Kim Hyung Wook also testified that he was told that alleged Korean influence-buyer Tongsun Park was replaced as an influence peddler in 1975 and that the new man was given $600,000 to carry on the work. However, he declined to identify his source publicly and did not say who had ordered Park replaced.

Kim, who headed the Korean Central Intelligence Agency (KCIA) from 1961 to 1969, told the House International Relations Committee he has seen the names of 15 to 20 House and Senate members on an alleged payoff list carried by Tongsun Park in 1971 and that Park told him the list was given him by the then-head of the KCIA.

He also said that two House members personally pledged their support for military aid to South Korea in 1967 or 1968 in exchange for an important business favor.

The Constitution prohibits congressmen and government officials from accepting gifts from any foreign government.

TESTIFYING under oath in Korean through an interpreter, the former KCIA chief said also he arranged for $3 million in government funds to be deposited in Park's American bank account after his nation's prime minister urged such a step.

He said Park used the money to obtain collateral for the loans which enabled him to buy the Georgetown Club, giving him a social base in the nation's capital in which to entertain high-ranking American government officials.

Kim said that when the club ran short of funds, he arranged for $100,000 in South Korean currency held by Park to be laundered in the South Korean black market, exchanged for U.S. currency and sent to Park in the United States.

He said he agreed to help after Park told him that "he would have many guests who were members of this Congress and he could exercise certain influence."

KIM, who said he is now a self-exiled political opponent of South

Korean President Park Chung Hee, testified that in late 1967 or 1968, Tongsun Park asked for help in becoming the sole agent for the purchase of American rice for the Korean market.

He said that at about the same time two congressmen came to him and said that "if this action was done they could do service in modernizing the Korean armed forces."

Kim would not name the two in open session but said he will do so when the committee meets privately.

He said that in the spring of 1976, after public allegations that Tongsun Park had made payoffs to members of Congress, one of the two congressmen contacted him personally and urged that he meet with Park. Kim said he refused.

'Dr. Zhivago' depicts Bolshevik revolution

By JIM CHALFANT
Collegian Reporter

"Dr. Zhivago" is Boris Pasternak's Pulitzer-prize winning novel brought to the screen in the 1965 Carlo Ponti production. It's one of the most successful films of all time, winning six Academy Awards.

Perhaps the most impressive of these awards is the one given to Robert Bolt for best screenplay. He did a fine job of adapting Pasternak's novel to film, with a well-developed plot and some fine characterizations.

Dr. Zhivago is a tale of war-torn Russia, set against the lives of several people. The characters are followed through World War I, the Bolshevik Revolution and the civil war between the Red and White armies.

YURI ZHIVAGO, played by Omar Sharif, is the film's most important character. Zhivago is a doctor and a popular poet. After serving in a hospital during World War I, he returns home to find things much different than the way he left them. His once-wealthy family has been reduced to the same level of poverty as everyone else and the Bolsheviks have requisitioned everything he owns. His family is forced to share their large house with many other families and no one has enough to live on.

Zhivago is unable to understand the Bolsheviks or what they stand for and through him we see the questions and fears of all the Russian people. He is disillusioned with the whole thing — his poetry is now being scorned as subversive, soldiers now regulate his movements and he can't understand how the changes were for the better.

THE DRAMA and tragedy of Zhivago's life expresses the sadness of the entire country during this time. The movie is highly critical of the revolution and stresses its stupidity. Through the eyes of Zhivago, we see the pointless changes made and the terrible acts committed in the guise of the liberation of the working class.

It's tough to find any faults with Dr. Zhivago. All things considered, it's pretty close to being the ultimate movie. The photography is excellent, capturing the Russian wilderness well. Also of special interest is the movie's score for which composer Maurice Jarre won an Academy Award. The music sets the moods throughout the movie, mainly with the hauntingly beautiful "Lara's Theme," better known as "Somewhere My Love."

WASHINGTON — The Senate Appropriations Committee rejected a proposal Wednesday to ban development of a controversial "neutron bomb" nuclear warhead designed to kill people while leaving buildings standing.

This so-called "enhanced radiation" weapon for the Lance missile is designed to kill people through the release of neutrons while allowing buildings to stand. Funds to start building the weapon were included in House-approved legislation which the committee was working on.

On a 13-7 vote, the committee agreed to continue funding for the breeder project at Oak Ridge, Tenn. The President wants the project canceled, but the committee voted instead to appropriate $150 million for the project for the upcoming fiscal year.

TOPEKA — A Topeka legislator said Wednesday he has asked the state bill drafting agency to prepare a bill to prohibit use of state funds to pay for abortions.

Rep. Charles Laird, D-Topeka, said he will file the bill for consideration by the 1978 legislature.

Laird said he also has asked preparation of a bill to allow hospitals to refuse use of their facilities for abortions.

Kansas has a law allowing hospital personnel to refuse to participate in performing an abortion without risk of losing their jobs, but there is no law granting a hospital the right to refuse use of its facilities for such a procedure.

MIAMI — Somewhere out there, a parrot eats through a plastic beak, a cow wears dentures, and a paraplegic dog moves about on a plastic chair with skateboard wheels.

"I would rather work on animals than anything else," says Dr. Irving Goldman, a prosthetist. "They don't show it, but they're grateful. You see it when they eat."

As a prosthetist, the 74-year-old doctor mostly works on people, giving them such artificial limbs as motorized substitutes for hands and legs. But he has also done a bit for animals.

Recently, he made dentures for a chimpanzee, the pet of a West Indian cargo ship captain. The chimp had lost three front teeth after a swinging crane knocked him down.

After the new teeth were in place, Goldman says, "the chimp gave me a kiss."

LAWRENCE — The University of Kansas said Wednesday it will not contest a $1,000 fine assessed the school by the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) in connection with an oil spill.

The incident occurred May 6 when an underground oil storage tank on campus ruptured and the leakage drained into the Wakarusa River.

Michael Davis, the KU general counsel, issued a statement saying, "In light of all the circumstances, including the amount of the assessment, it was our determination that the most appropriate course of action was simply to pay."

The Coast Guard also is investigating the incident, and the EPA has recommended that the U.S. attorney consider filing criminal action against KU because of a two-day delay in reporting the oil leak.

KANSAS CITY — George Brett collected his third hit of the night, stole second and scored on Al Cowens' eighth-inning single Wednesday night, giving the Kansas City Royals a 4-3 victory over Seattle.

Royals' starter Paul Spletter left the game in the sixth inning after being struck in the right leg by a ball off the bat of Craig Reynolds. Reliever Doug Bird, 3-1, got the victory.

Senate committee rejects saccharin ban

WASHINGTON (AP) — Calling it the wrong approach at the wrong time, a Senate committee rejected a House-passed proposal Wednesday to block any government ban on saccharin for 15 months.

But the senator who led the move against the House proposal said he did so only because he was certain Congress will pass legislation by the fall to delay any saccharin ban for 18 months.

Sen. Thomas Eagleton, D-Mo., said the new legislation would allow the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) more freedom to act on health hazards posed by the artificial sweetener than the House bill does.

EAGLETON also noted that the FDA has promised not to impose its ban before Oct. 1.

The agency announced Monday it was delaying the final orders on its proposed ban at least until the fall to allow authorities to evaluate new studies linking saccharin to bladder cancer in humans, especially men.

On Tuesday, the House attached a provision to a $13.7-billion appropriations bill for the Agriculture Department, FDA and related agencies that banned the use of any of the funds to enforce a saccharin ban before Oct. 1, 1978.

Saccharin ban questionable

The Food and Drug Administration's ban on saccharin still stands. The artificial sweetener is suspected of being carcinogenic, although the tests it has undergone have been questioned by a number of physicians.

The primary research done on the sweetener was performed in Canada using 200 rats. When given large quantities of saccharin, 12 of the rats developed bladder cancer. For a human to ingest the same amount of saccharin, he would have to drink 800 cans of diet-soda per day. But, because the sweetener could prove to be cancer-producing in humans, the FDA banned it.

THE CONTROVERSY surrounding the ban has raised questions applicable to other FDA-banned products.

Generally, the products banned were administered in larger-than-average doses to the laboratory animals. The question of whether a product which produces cancer in animals can also produce cancer in man has been raised.

Despite the controversy and the mud-slinging the FDA has suffered, the organization is only doing its job. If a substance is believed to be cancer-producing, it is the responsibility of the FDA to test and, if necessary, ban the substance. The only method of changing this situation is by legislation.

CONGRESS has not seen a reason, until the ban of saccharin, to question the authority of the FDA.

Some method of checking up on the FDA should be established. The FDA has gone out of bounds on many of its bans, unable to provide concrete evidence of why the ban was made.

Farmers must unite

It's no secret in Kansas that farmers in this country lack a collective voice in Washington. It should be no surprise that the farmer is getting badly burned by politicians and that his livelihood is being used as a political and a foreign policy tool.

I'm not a native of Kansas and I don't fully understand the Kansas agricultural-economic system. But I do have a grasp of the basic laws of supply and demand and understand that even if a group as big as the American farmers doesn't have a well-organized, efficient lobbying organization in Washington, they're out of luck.

The National Farmers Union and the American Farm Bureau Federation are among the top 15 lobbying spenders in Washington, yet their efforts in terms of direct benefits to members don't reflect the amount they spend.

COMBINED, the organizations spend more than $200,000 courting legislators and peddling influence and the Kansas farmer may barely break even on his 1977 wheat crop.

Granted, much of the problem in representing farmers is the farmers' own characters. Unlike members of the American Medical Association or the various union organizations represented by interest groups, the farmer is a staunchly individualistic person. He doesn't easily fit into the cogs of the well-oiled political machine at the Capitol.

Individualism isn't a drawback, it's a virtue of the farmers and it should be recognized and exploited as such.

FARMERS AS a group aren't cohesive. In many cases, the only thing farmers have in common is farming. Political ideals and philosophies vary widely among American farmers and it's very difficult to lump them into one group and say you're representing them all in Washington.

As a result, drives for higher wheat price supports have fallen short if not failed altogether. Wheat and other grain crops have been overplanted to such a large extent that the huge surpluses are making it impossible for the farmer to realize a profit.

And when wheat prices get as low as they are, and finished-good prices continue to rise, it would also seem the farmer is getting robbed by someone.

It would do the farmers well to set aside their individualism long enough to raise their collective voice and demand the attention of the federal government. They've waited long enough for things to get straightened out and enough farmers have gone bankrupt due to ridiculous prices to warrant some action.

They've got a farmer in the Presidency and several representatives from heavy agricultural states in Congress. If farmers go for much longer getting the short end of the legislative stick, they just might get rowdy.

Schools need higher standards

If you pick up a magazine today, it would not be surprising to find an article about "Why Johnny can't read." Most of the articles blame the school system. Some say Johnny can't read because his teachers can't read. And, when you consider what kind of students are in college, it is not surprising that occasionally a teacher slips through who doesn't know how to read or write.

Our society has come to believe that a college education is essential to get ahead in the world. We seem to believe that anyone who wants to go to college should be able to.

Why? It used to be if you wanted to go to college, you had to pass entrance exams and go through interviews with college officials. Now, if you are a high school graduate, you can often get into a state college in your home state. If we must accept any student who graduates from high school, let's make sure he knows something. If necessary, revise our high schools to make sure they teach the basics, and make sure the students learn the basics.

In 1960, Denver, Colorado decided its high school diplomas were going to mean something. From the time a student enters high school as a freshman, until he has completed his four years, he is given a four part test which covers the basics of math and English.

Once the student passes a segment, he does not have to retake it. But if the student has failed to pass all four parts by the time he has completed four years, he does not get a diploma, but a certificate of attendance.

In Denver, diplomas mean something.

Maybe we should return to the days of entrance exams and interviews if we cannot make sure high school graduates are capable of comprehending the material presented at college.

College education is NOT for everyone. Colleges, all colleges are supposed to be institutions of higher education with the best of America's youth attending. Let's make them that.

Letter to the editor

Women's little pleasures

Editor,

After reading your article about poor little women I was so shocked I had to call in Mildred (who was plowing the lower 40) to show her what women have to go through to please a man.

After Mildred went back to work I decided your article was really too radical.

Case in point:

1. Hands off Mr. Whipple. He's only doing his job. How else are women to find out about the quality of toilet paper other than by giving the old T.P. a little squeeze?

One of women's little pleasures is shopping - although they still have math problems (in keeping a budget). Before too long this pleasure will go to such an extreme that all females will be squeezing everything in Playgirl magazines to cans of peaches! (Naughty!)

2. How dare you attack Geritol (30 swats with a dirty dishrag!). Lawrence Welk would weep if he heard you say that.

If has been scientifically proven (using 300 Canadian rats) that females have more energy from a single bottle of Geritol than from one hour viewing "Love of Life." With all this excess energy it seems only right that men should put women to work - although I still have to remind Mildred now and then.

... "Mildred, I really didn't mean that! Put me down Mildred!"

State star fashions new career

By TOM FAULKNER

When Larry Dassie came to K-State two years ago, the basketball fans wondered how quickly he could make the transition from junior college competition to big college competition.

In 1975, Dassie, a two-time all-conference choice at Dodge City Community College, was a highly recruited all-American averaging 23 points and 19.8 rebounds per game.

In his first year at K-State, the Jacksonville native averaged 6.8 points and 6.3 rebounds per contest. This past season, Dassie averaged 13 points and six rebounds per game.

His aggressiveness, both offensively and defensively, was recognized by his selection to the second all-Big Eight team.

ACCORDING to Dassie, it was head coach Jack Hartman who helped him develop his basketball skills.

"Coach Hartman taught me many basketball skills," Dassie said. "He would tell us what caused pressure and he helped us handle it. He also taught us how to create it."

Two weeks ago, the NBA held its annual college draft but Dassie wasn't selected. Dassie said

"When I get my degree I would prefer not working in one place," Dassie said. "I would rather be able to come and go with my work."

DASSIE believes the K-State basketball fans can look forward to better K-State teams.

"K-State's future in basketball is excellent," Dassie said. "With the quality and intelligence of the players and the coaches, K-State won't have any trouble in the future."

What will Dassie miss most about K-State?

"I guess I will miss the intensity of playing in Ahearn, the energy in the air caused by the fans and their enthusiasm for K-State basketball," Dassie said.

Sports

professional basketball is not out of the question, however.

"I'm considering every possibility," Dassie said, "but I plan to finish school and get my fashion design degree."

"What I would really like to do while I am finishing school is work in a couple of stores for experience because there is a great need for male designers in the female fashion world."

Struggling Borg, Connors gain in Wimbledon classic

WIMBLEDON, England (AP) — Fifth-seeded Brian Gottfried and 10th-rated Adriano Panatta of Italy were upset victims Wednesday in the third day of play at the 100th Wimbledon Tennis Championships.

A record crowd of 37,355 saw Byron Bertram, a notoriously erratic South African, find his top form and beat Gottfried 6-2, 4-6, 6-4, 6-3 in a second-round match.

Sandy Mayer of Mendham, N.J., a slim shotmaker with a reputation for giant-killing at Wimbledon, put out Panatta 8-9, 6-0, 6-2, 6-4.

The two top favorites, defending champion Bjorn Borg and controversial Jimmy Connors, both moved into the third round, but each had to fight his way out of trouble.

BORG trailed by two sets to big Mark Edmondson of Australia and said afterwards he was lucky to save his skin. He came back to win 3-6, 7-9, 6-2, 6-4, 6-1.

Connors, the bad boy of the tournament, overcame Marty Riessen 6-4, 8-9, 6-1, 8-6.

N.Y. star to leave K-State

Tyrone Ladson, who was expected to bolster the K-State team, is apparently leaving K-State.

Ladson, a sophomore from Brooklyn, N.Y. who came to K-State with teammate Curtis Redding and coach Mark Reiner, was reported to have been dissatisfied with the amount of action he saw last season.

Ladson and Coach Jack Hartman were both unavailable for comment.

Meanwhile, the women's spotlight belonged to an aging queen, Billie Jean King, and a rising young princess, Tracy Austin.

The 33-year-old King, searching for her seventh Wimbledon singles crown, beat 17-year-old Anne Smith of Dallas 6-8, 6-0, 6-3.

And Austin, a 14-year-old schoolgirl from Rolling Hills, Calif. and the youngest competitor in Wimbledon's 100-year history, made a successful debut against Ellie Vessies-Appel of the Netherlands, winning 6-3, 6-3.

Connors' match was a tough one. Riessen reached a peak in the tiebreaker of the second set, winning it 7-1.

The bouncy little left-hander came back to take control in the third set, but in the fourth he was in deep trouble again. Riessen had two set points at 5-4, but failed to capitalize on them.

Rape victims plagued by myths

By LAURIE LYNCH
Collegian Reporter

Sexual assault is a crime against not only the body, but also the mind.

According to Margaret Nordin, associate director of the Center for Student Development, and Caroline Peine, instructor in the same department, women not only suffer physical discomfort, but also mental anguish after having been assaulted sexually.

"If a woman has been forced against her will to have intercourse or a threat of intercourse, it is sexual assault," Nordin said.

"It's sexual assault any time where there is some attempt at some sort of sexual conduct," Peine said.

THE CENTER behind the energies of Nordin and Peine, formalized a sexual assault service to aid victims. For assistance, a victim is to call 532-6011 where 24-hour operators assist victims and channel calls to counselors.

Workers are all volunteers who are connected with the University, Nordin said. Their only qualifications must be a genuine concern for those calling in.

Prior to the formalization of the sexual assault service, Peine conducted an informal service "out of concern." Victims had someone to talk to who would offer them help.

The service hasn't been used very much.

"We've found that persons really aren't aware of the service," Nordin said.

THE ONLY publicity the service has had has been word-of-mouth, she said.

There is not a "typical" attack victim, Peine said, but there are some common reactions. The victim is frightened and this fear needs to be expressed, recognized and understood. A woman may feel she has lost control of her body, maybe even her life. Counseling is an effort to make her feel she has regained control, Peine said.

"Support of family and friends is important. At some point she's going to have to move back into her pattern of life," Peine said.

THE VICTIM also may feel guilty and wonder whether her fear and feelings are justified, she said.

"This myth that the girl brought it on herself is ridiculous," Nordin said. "Of course, her feelings are justified, she has just been assaulted."

Sometimes a victim will not seek aid immediately after she has been attacked.

"Often it's not an immediate situation," Nordin said. "It's not unusual for anyone to wait."

A victim may wait as long as a year, or until another current attack triggers her to report her attack.

THIS TENDENCY to wait may be attributed to the fear of judgment a victim believes will be passed on her, Peine said.

It's extremely important to be supportive and non-judgmental, she said.

S"Sometimes a victim may mistake concern for criticism," Peine said. She must know that people understand and trust her.

The experience of sexual assault is one not easily forgotten. A victim may go through a period of anger at a later time.

"She must turn this anger into something constructive," Peine said. For example, a victim may help another victim simply by talking with her. There is that feeling of "I know I don't have to explain how I feel to you," between the two, she said.

Also, she may help the police in role-playing situations.

"This shows an incredible amount of concern," Peine said.

THERE ARE similar services throughout Kansas in such places as Topeka, Kansas City, and Wichita.

"There is so much education that has to be done. There are so many myths that are completely false," Nordin said.

In an effort to present some facts of sexual assault and to discount some of the myths, there is a class offered through the University For Man (UFM) on "The Phenomenon of Rape."

The class meets at 7:30 p.m., June 22, 26, and July 6 at the First Congregational Church, 700 Poyntz.

The first UFM session will discuss "Aspects of Rape and Sexual Assault." The second will deal with self-defense techniques and will include a showing of the film "Nobody's Victim." The third session, "Care for the BVictim-Physical and Psychological Aspects," will discuss the importance of physical and mental health testing after an attack.

K-State considers rejoining organization that the whole face of this country has to be changed, and don't rely on any politician or any party."

According to Newsweek, the delegates applauded when Hayden added "there'll be more Columbias. No presidential candidate will be safe speaking at any university in this country."

A few voices raised in protest against all of this, but the majority of the students thought everything added up to "a mind-blowing affair," Newsweek said.

"The group was not actually radical, but intensely dealing with the times," said Sue Maes, director of University For Man (UFM) in Manhattan, who was a staff member at the NSA conference.

"At that point in time, student leaders were radical and looking for changes. The association (NSA) gave them new ideas and supported issues that were important to students. NSA was a helpful catalyst in the formation of UFM," Maes said.

AFTER THE 1968 conference held at K-State, a student referendum was held to determine if K-State would remain a member of NSA. The College Republicans took a very negative stance toward the organization and headed a campaign against the issue.

"With the disclosure of the NSA-CIA tie, the organization lost its credibility," said Chet Peters, vice-president for student affairs.

"NSA took a liberal view on the current issues and were being supported by the most conservative organization in the world. They lost their viability when this became public knowledge," Peters said.

"They were effective in indicating services they could provide, but very ineffective in executing their plans," he said.

The referendum was defeated and K-State's membership ended.

AFTER THE CIA ceased to fund NSA, the organization went bankrupt. Still in existence today, NSA is currently in the rebuilding stages and has asked K-State to rejoin with the assurance it is supported entirely through dues and memberships.

"SGA (Student Governing Association) is presently very active at a state level working with the Board of Regents and University administration," Peters said. "They are currently involved in the decision making that affects their lives and this is the objective of NSA."

"The viable concept I can see of the organization would be its platform in the area of a national conference," he said.

Grant will establish center for economics

A $10,000 grant has been awarded to K-State by the Kansas Bankers Association (KBA) for the purpose of establishing a Center for Economic Education.

The grant, made to the Kansas Council on Economic Education, was presented to Emerson Hazlett, executive director of the council, and to K-State President Duane Acker.

"The primary purpose of the center is to help teachers understand how the American economic system works," Hazlett said, "and to help teachers become economically literate."

THE $10,000 will be used to purchase materials, hold seminars, and to fund graduate students developing teaching aids, Hazlett said. Other activities include clinics and courses for developing teaching materials and techniques and workshops for teachers.

The aim of the center is to aid teachers at the elementary and secondary levels in using concepts of economics, Hazlett said.

"If, for example, a third-grade teacher wants to teach the concept of supply and demand, the center could provide a prepared unit to assist," Hazlett said.

The center will be located in the College of Education and materials from other centers throughout Kansas will also be available. The University of Kansas has a similar center funded by the KBA.

Union may acquire automated tellers

By MARK EHRHARD
Collegian Reporter

It may be easier to obtain cash at the K-State Union this fall.

"We are negotiating with all the (Manhattan) banks for an automated teller," said Walt Smith, Union director.

Department merger official on July 1

The merger of the Dairy and Poultry Science Department with the Animal Science and Industry Department will be officially completed July 1.

The merger will result in the newly-organized Department of Animal Sciences and Industry, to be headed by Don Good, present head of the animal science and industry department.

It has not been determined how the merger will affect the curriculum.

"At this time there are still many details being worked out," said Drayford Richardson, professor of animal science and industry.

The newly-formed Department of Forestry will move into Call Hall, where the dairy and poultry sections will remain. Main offices for the animal sciences and industry department will be in Weber Hall.

A card similar to a credit card would be used with the automatic teller to withdraw money from a bank account. It also might be possible to deposit funds and transfer funds from one account to another, such as from a savings to a checking account.

Smith said one or two tellers may be placed in the vicinity of the self-service post office.

"We don't feel we would have a need for more than two machines," he said.

Smith said the tellers would reduce check cashing lines, cut down on transactions at the business office and allow cash to be available to students any time.

Many not covered for flood damage

When flooding rains destroy or damage a home, many people think their home owners insurance will cover all flooding damage. Most of them are in for an unpleasant surprise. Most home owners insurance doesn't include damage by floods, according to the Insurance Institute of America.

Most insurance agencies have an "all risks" hazards coverage which people mistakenly think covers all hazards. This type of coverage includes everything except those listed specifically in the policy — usually earthquakes, termites and floods.

The Union is open, including Sundays.

"We're anxious to try one of them out," Smith said. "We just hope we can work it out with the banks so we can have at least one for the fall."

Legislature OKs planning for coal-fired power plant

By LISA SANDMEYER
Collegian Reporter

Preliminary planning for a coal-fired power plant to serve the K-State campus beginning in 1986 has been authorized by the 1977 Kansas Legislature.

K-State's present power plant uses natural gas as primary fuel and fuel oil as secondary fuel. The university cannot operate on any other type of fuel.

"The prospects for natural gas (in the future) are not at all good," said Paul Young, vice president for university development.

"The federal government has told the City Service Gas Company, which supplies most of eastern Kansas, that they won't be allowed to take on any new customers after this year," Young said. "This is just an indication of the seriousness of the fuel problem."

"We are also close to exceeding the capacity of the boilers in the present plant," he said.

THE FIRM of Stone and Webster, N.Y., was hired by the state to draw up plans for several state agencies, including K-State. Stone and Webster recommended the coal-fired plant be located on North Manhattan Ave., near the existing microwave towers and new bakery science building.

The building housing the first boiler will be approximately 50 by 65 by 80 feet (eight stories high). Each additional boiler will require the same housing. The plant's smokestack will be approximately 200 feet high.

The plant's stack will be equipped to remove 99.4 per cent of the solid material, "fly ash," produced by burning coal.

"We're very sensitive to the environmental considerations," Young said. "When I present a proposal like this to a group, I like to tell the men they can go home and tell their wives that they can continue to put the wash out on the line."

WHEN BURNING coal, there is also a problem with sulfur gases reacting in the atmosphere to produce sulfuric acid, Young said. The K-State plant will burn coal mined in western states which have lower sulfur content than coal from eastern states.

After the coal-fired plant is completed, it will be used to supplement the present gas and oil plant, as long as natural gas and fuel oil are available. The present plant will be phased out as fuel becomes less available.

The coal-fired plant will supply all heat for the campus except Danforth Chapel, and all steam-run air conditioners, but will have no capacity to produce electricity. The present plant can provide about 25 per cent of the electricity needed on campus and is available for emergency use.

THE COAL-FIRED plant will use trash as a secondary fuel, which will help eliminate some solid waste in Manhattan, Young said.

The University of Kansas will have a plant similar to K-State's, but will burn trash (solid waste) as its primary fuel, supplementing with coal, Young said. Manhattan, however, doesn't have enough solid waste in the area to use trash as a primary fuel, he said.

Coal will be delivered by rail to Manhattan and stored at a prepared site. There will be no outside storage of coal at the plant site.

Kansas prisons: Few escapes succeed; crime decides security

By NANCY DENNING
Collegian Reporter

A prisoner escaped from a prison work area at Lansing, two women prisoners escaped from Lansing Women's Prison.

Last week, three felonious criminals escaped from the U.S. Disciplinary Barracks at Fort Leavenworth and two are still at large.

In Kansas, there are three types of prisons — minimum, medium and maximum security, according to Robert Nye, assistant director of the Kansas State Penitentiary at Lansing.

Work release houses (halfway houses), which are minimum security, imprison first offenders and those accused of non-violent crimes, Nye said.

MEDIUM security prisons are for individuals who have committed a crime between the categories of non-violent and extreme, such as white collar crimes, Nye said. A white collar crime includes bribery, embezzlement or fraud.

Sally Halford, director of Lansing Women's Prison, a medium security prison, said the prison has no towers and has a limited security staff.

The woman's prison houses 92 inmates ages 18 to 60 years. The majority of the inmates are first offenders in their early 20's. The major offenses are property crimes.

"It is easy to escape if someone has a mind to," Halford said. Within the last two months, she said, there have been two escapes.

"There is no one here to survey the whole (prison) area," she said.

HALFORD said the major problem is some inmates with short sentences must be housed with those who have long sentences. There are two units, she said, but to keep them totally separated is impossible. Presently four official prisoner counts are made each day and hourly checks are attempted also, Halford said.

Three guidelines are used in deciding where a prisoner will be imprisoned. The prisoner's background and his present sentence are the prime factors.

"If the offender is 25 years or older, serving a long term with no prior record, he is sent to a minimum security prison," Nye said.

"He is sent to the U.S. Penitentiary at Leavenworth or the U.S. Penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., if he is 26 years or older, has a long term and prior record of serious offenses," Nye said.

Anyone serving a felony charge can go to a penitentiary and length of sentences can vary from 10 years to life, said Charles Benson, director of the U.S. Penitentiary at Leavenworth.

LEAVENWORTH, a maximum security prison, has 1,841 inmates, ages 25 to 71 years. There have been no escapes within the last year and Benson attributes this to the plant facilities, the armed towers and staff members who are alert.

"The penitentiary does have an escape plan (for security) in case of attempted breaks," Benson said.

Kansas State Penitentiary at Lansing, a maximum security prison, has 974 inmates, ages 19 to 60 years. They are serving sentences from two years to multiple life, according to Nye.

Earlier this month, an inmate escaped while clearing an area of brush in a prison work area and was apprehended four days later. Nye said the work areas have been changed to more open areas.

"Lansing has never had an escape within the walls of the prison," Nye said. "They do keep an escape plan."

KANSAS State Industrial Reformatory at Hutchinson is also a maximum security prison and has a wall unit and guarded towers.

"There are not a lot of older prisoners (at Hutchinson)," Rahl said. "There have been no escapes out of the wall unit in the last year. As precautions, there are regular shake-downs, security posts are alert and there are thorough screenings before a prisoner is allowed minimum custody."

The United States Disciplinary Barracks (USDB) at Leavenworth, a maximum security prison, had three inmates escape from a nightwork detail last week.

"They (prisoners) overcame the night supervisor," said Col. Stauber, USDB Public affairs officer. "They tricked and overwhelmed a tower guard and then let themselves down the prison wall."

"We (USDB staff) are always reviewing procedures. Every aspect of the escape is being reviewed," Stauber said.

RILEY COUNTY Jail is considered a minimum security prison. It holds people until tried and then they are moved to Lansing or Hutchinson Reformatory, said Wayne Anderson, inspector.

Last year, one prisoner escaped from the Riley County Jail.

"As long as people are confined against their will," Rahl said, "there will be escapes. There hasn't been a prison made that someone hasn't escaped from, including Alcatraz."

Neutron bomb: senseless waste

The Senate Appropriations Committee Wednesday once again demonstrated how terribly inept it can be.

The committee approved the continuation of the development of a "Neutron bomb", designed to kill people without causing damage to buildings.

President Carter had requested that the project be discontinued, but the committee ignored his request and allocated $150 million to continue the research.

In a time when Carter is striving for world peace, the development of an "enhanced radiation" weapon can only make the United States look two-faced.

HOW WILL other nations be able to trust the United States in peaceful negotiations when the United States is developing a bomb that could someday be used to destroy them?

And the United States needs another atomic bomb about as much as it needs another depression.

Developing a new bomb is not only a waste of money, but also a waste of intelligence.

Recent estimates show the United States has enough atomic weapons to kill the people of the Soviet Union ten times.

THE LIST of areas where $150 million could be put to better use is endless.

People are hungry, housing is scarce, the unemployment rate is high, and the aged are cast aside like archaic machinery because of the lack of funds.

A lot of people could be fed, many jobs created, more houses built and help for the elderly could be provided with $150 million.

Apparently the appropriations committee has decided that man-made buildings are more important than man himself.

With any kind of luck, the project will blow up in the faces of the committee members.

Bureaucracy K-State style

Editor:

Monday I was in the Comptroller's Office and was treated to a new rendition of "Bureaucracy, K-State Style." The experience was quite edifying.

The comedy began with a girl coming into the office of the Comptroller with a white slip showing she had dropped a class and requesting a partial refund. The dutiful clerk informed the girl that she must have her summer fee card to get a refund. The girl replied that she didn't have the card with her. The helpful clerk then suggested that another cashier in the office would provide her with a new fee card for a dollar. The girl protested, "Couldn't you just look in this other cashier's records and see that I'm in Summer School?" "No," replied the clerk, "I must see the card right here before me before you can get your refund."

"I don't have a dollar with me. Could I get the copy of my card and then have you deduct a dollar from my refund?" This idea made a great deal of sense to me—that was my first clue that the request would be turned down. "Oh no," answered the clerk, "you must pay the dollar first before I can give you your $21 refund." Finding she was getting nowhere, the girl left.

The girl returned 10 minutes later. She had found her fee card. But, the crafty Comptroller's Office was not to be foiled in its effort to keep its .1000 STSA (Screw the Student Average). Upon receiving the refund slip and the fee card, the clerk told the student she would get her money during the first week in July. "Why?" the girl asked, "When I enrolled in the class, I gave you the money on the same day. I had to. Why can't you give my money back on the same day?" The clerk retorted, "Because the check must be mailed" (Brilliant move—the clerk succeeded in befuddling and ripping off the student in one bold stroke!!) "Why?" Why being an inoperative question for a bureaucrat, the quick response was, "Why what?" The student explained, "Why does it have to be mailed? I want my money now." "It has to be mailed because THAT'S THE RULE." (Why else?)

AFTER pondering the graceful way in which the young clerk stuck it to the student, I quickly realized that the one basic principle followed by our officialdom is "Give more import to an artificial rule than to real people with real needs." I also decided that the only way to deal with the official system is to provide fair turnabout and thus achieve fair play. For example,

1.) If given a parking ticket, refuse to pay on the grounds that the ticket wasn't in triplicate; one copy for you, one for your parents, and one for your records. They'll understand.

2.) When registering classes, refuse to pay your tuition on the grounds that "your check must be mailed". If asked why, tell them "that's the rule". They'll understand.

3.) Whenever dealing with an administrator, act asinine and as strident as possible. If questioned about your actions or attitude, don't explain. If pushed, mutter something incoherent. They'll understand.

These are only a few of the ideas that a feeble-minded undergrad like myself can come up with. On the other hand, hundreds of administrators have been concentrating on creating like procedures for over 100 years. Obviously I'm no match for this august tradition. I could never aspire to do things as absurdly as they do. However, if all of the students on campus made it their goal to do unto the bureaucracy on campus as it has done unto us, they'll quickly get the message.

DOUAI, France — The flashing blade of a guillotine chopped off the head of a child killer at dawn Thursday in this northern French city, rekindling a national debate over capital punishment.

Jerome Carrein, convicted of drowning 8-year-old Cathy Petit in a marsh in 1975 after unsuccessfully trying to rape her, went under the blade in a prison courtyard, the second killer of a child to be guillotined in the past 12 months.

ST. LOUIS — Four fingers severed from the left hand of a St. Louis County businessman have been successfully reattached through the use of new microvascular surgery techniques, according to the St. Louis University School of Medicine.

A spokesman said a surgical team worked with microscopes, needles that can pierce a hair and thread about half the size of a human hair to repair severed arteries, veins and nerves in the hand of Fred Baker, 42, of Kirkwood.

LOCUST GROVE, Okla. — Officers were on the trail of an unidentified man in a wooded area near here Thursday afternoon and Mayes County officials at nearby Pryor prepared to file murder charges against an escaped rapist in the brutal slayings of three Girl Scouts.

The developments came within hours after Mayes County Dist. Atty. Sid Wise said three separate counts of first-degree murder would be filed Thursday afternoon naming Gene LeRoy Hart, 33, in the deaths of the girls, ages 8, 9 and 10, at Camp Scott on June 13.

Mudflats affect future of Tuttle Creek

By RICK SEITZ
Collegian Reporter

In 1938, Congress allocated approximately $90 million to build Tuttle Creek Dam and Reservoir. Even then the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers knew the useful life of the reservoir would be about 100 years.

The main controversy was not how long the reservoir would last, but whether the dam was needed in the first place, Corps representatives said.

The Corps claimed Tuttle Creek Dam was a needed part of the Missouri River Valley flood control system. The people, whose homes would be 40 feet under water is the dam was built claimed proper watershed management and a series of smaller dams along the tributaries of the Big Blue River could accomplish the same goals.

By the time the dam was completed both Presidents Truman and Eisenhower, and several Army generals had become involved in the controversy. An incumbent congressman lost his election and 4,000 residents were forced to move because of the new dam.

NOW THAT Tuttle Creek is slowly dying, the controversy of the future will be what to do with Tuttle Creek mudflats, say Corps engineers.

"Tuttle Creek has a 100-year life expectancy," said Frank Funk, chief ranger at Tuttle Creek. "That statement is in itself misleading. It means Congress has approved Tuttle Creek for 100 years."

Funk said silt washes down from the surrounding farms into the river. Where the river meets the lake is where most sediment is dropped.

"About seven million tons of silt gets washed into Tuttle Creek each year," Funk said. "Some of the lighter sediment gets washed out the tubes, but it is a very small volume compared to what stays in the lake.

"Mudflats have already appeared in the north end of the reservoir," Funk said. "We have had to abandon Swede Creek Park because there isn't any water to launch the boats off the boat ramp. If the level of the conservation pool goes down one foot, Fancy Creek Marina is practically useless."

"If nothing is done, the useful reservoir will extend from the dam to somewhere between Baldwin and Stockdale, maybe even closer to the dam," Funk said. "You can dredge, but you are only buying a few years time, or we could raise the level of the conservation pool, but that would take an act of Congress since they control the dam."

Funk believes the dam was definitely worth building.

"To date, we have received three times what we paid for the dam in flood control benefits," Funk said. "That is how many dollars have been saved in Manhattan, Topeka, Lawrence and Kansas City."

Funk also said the dam had benefited wildlife and recreation in the area.

"Unfortunately the problem of siltation affects all the dams in the midwest," said Orville Bidwell, professor of agronomy. "I see no reason why the land can't be used for agriculture."

"The most important thing would be to get air back into the soil. The land would require special drainage and deep plowing."

"The way the lake is silting in, maybe in 25 years, they will start farming again at the north end of the reservoir," Bidwell said.

Suzuki teaches violin through mimicry

By SUSAN BURDEN
Collegian Reporter

Suzuki.

A motorcycle? Yes, but before it was a machine, it was an art. Suzuki is the Oriental method of teaching children to play orchestral instruments.

Janice Albright, a grade school, junior high and high school instructor of orchestra, started teaching a summer school session is suzuki three years ago.

"It's a violin method started in Japan that's based on the idea children learn to speak before they can read," Albright said. "It teaches through mimicking. The children copy what I show them."

IN THE traditional form of suzuki, a violin instructor teaches a mother to play by ear and she in turn teaches her child. The children are also supposed to bow before and after their lessons.

"I guess I teach the Albright Modified Method because I'm not a suzuki purist," Albright said. She teaches one summer class for three and four-year-olds and an other class for six and seven-year-olds.

"There is no music or notes to read in this class," she said. "We play totally by ear. It's tremendous because it lets the children hear intonations and tone variances."

"The six to seven-year-olds are playing five to six pieces pretty well. They can do a lot that conventional classes can't do,"

Albright said. "They can make up pieces and compose and they can follow rhythm patterns easily."

ALBRIGHT said she believes she is preparing a nucleus of leaders for future orchestral playing.

"When these children start playing in an orchestra, they'll be better off because they'll be more comfortable with their instruments and they'll be able to follow rhythms easier," she said.

Albright said the younger a child is, the more flexible he is.

"They (the children) can bend every which way and they're not uncomfortable. They can hold a violin easier," she said. "We do a lot of moving around, jumping up and down, skipping and hopping. We move around to feel the beat."

BECAUSE they don't read music, Albright tries to introduce note reading at the end of the summer session.

"It's so easy to play by ear," she said, "but it's hard to get them to read music."

Albright thinks suzuki is helpful in teaching young children to play instruments. It teaches them to become comfortable with their instruments, to play by ear and listen better.

Civil defense program includes K-State

By DENNIS BOONE
Collegian Reporter

It was a warm day on the K-State campus, possibly a Sunday, probably in the autumn. The wail of the University siren breaks the quiet afternoon and moments later, a brilliant flash rises from the floor of the Flint Hills.

Nuclear war. What do you do?

K-State is part of the overall county-wide program under the direction of the Riley County Civil Defense Department.

According to Vice-President of University Development Paul Young, that is the way things should be.

"In the occurrence of a natural disaster or nuclear war, K-State would be no different than any other local institution," Young said. "We are tied into the Riley County program and would work in cooperation with them in the event of such disasters. It is better that we fit in as part of the overall, county-wide program."

ACCORDING to a manuscript published by Riley County, the civil defense program is separated into eight areas: information, physical plant, fire and police, health and welfare, military advisory, agriculture, monitoring and detection, and engineering. Each division contains at least one faculty representative from K-State. Young is chairman of the project.

Young admitted K-State's renown in the fields of agriculture and architecture — two areas vital to the continued existence of nuclear war survivors — would make K-State a potential target, but he could not say as to how strategic a target this, or any other major university, would be.

"Institutions such as this do represent a reservoir of special expertise," Young said. "But I don't think I could tell you what the strategic elimination of K-State would represent. But, being as close to Fort Riley as we are, I'm sure it really doesn't matter."

"While there is certainly some concern over the aspects of war in civil defense, there is really much more to it," he said. "In this area we are concerned a great deal with tornado and wind and water problems. That's civil defense, too."

Young conceded K-State may be lacking in its efforts to keep posted signs telling students where to go in the event of a natural disaster, but added, "Maybe that's something we will have to check into. Maybe that's something we need to have done."

Old stadium hurt by recent rains

A week of heavy rains poured water a foot deep into West Stadium, causing an estimated $2,000 in damage to equipment and supplies.

Carpeting in offices and the Purple Masque Theatre was ruined, as were books and supplies on lower shelves and in file cabinets. Two movie cameras were destroyed by the water and the curtains in the Masque have water lines around the bottom.

Umberger Hall also had some damage. A few inches of water seeped into a storage area and ruined several reams of paper stored on the floor.

Performances set for marching band

And the band plays on... K-State's Marching Band has been asked to play at the Dallas Cowboys-Washington Redskins contest Oct. 16 in Dallas, as well as playing at the Kansas City Chiefs-Green Bay Packers game and the K-State-K.U. game Nov. 5 and 6, said Phil Hewett, band director.

The group has also been asked to play at the Texas State Fair in the Cotton Bowl Oct. 18.

"It's quite an honor to be selected to play at the Redskins game and the fair over other bands in that area like (Texas) A & M and the University of Texas," said Tim Schlieker, 1977 band president. "They specifically asked for us this (Redskins) game."

Steve Hoffman, a snake collector from Junction City, comforts his Cook's tree boa. Hoffman owns several types of snakes including three boa constrictors.

Man lives with many snakes; claims they make good pets

By DIXIE HOLMES
Collegian Reporter

"My boa constrictors aren't big enough to hurt anyone—yet."

Steve Hoffman, instructor of a University for Man herpetology course, is "into snakes." He has eight snakes of six varieties living in the basement of his Junction City home.

"Sometimes I have more," Hoffman said. "I catch snakes that are native to Kansas in the summer and release them in the winter."

His permanent pets are a male and female boa constrictor whom he hopes to breed, a Cook's tree boa and a 10-foot reticulated python.

Hoffman said he believes it's important people learn a healthy respect for snakes.

"Some think there are only two types of snakes: poisonous snakes and dead snakes," Hoffman said.

SNAKES ARE often helpful. The bull snake can save farmers money by eating rats and gophers, he said.

Hoffman tries to dispell some of the myths that exist about snakes. For example, snakes aren't slimy, they don't "sting" with their tongues, nor are all snakes with triangular heads poisonous.

"It's a shame people don't understand snakes better," Hoffman said as he held his boa constrictor. "Fear is usually a result of ignorance about the animals."

According to Hoffman, another myth is there are water moccasins in Kansas.

"Kansas has harmless water snakes but no water moccasins," he said.

Hoffman keeps his pets in cages, but occasionally lets them loose in his living room. He only lets loose snakes that are longer than three feet to assure finding them again.

Once when one of his boa constrictors was loose, it wrapped itself around an antique table and refused to let go.

"Dad finally had to unscrew the whole table to get the snake off," Hoffman said. "Mom was pretty upset."

Occasionally he gets bitten but he doesn't keep any poisonous snakes.

"I think it is criminal for private individuals to keep poisonous snakes. They are just too dangerous for amateurs to handle and it is too easy for them to escape," Hoffman said.

"If one did escape and bit someone, the chances of a local hospital having the correct serum are slim."

BEING BITTEN by a snake feels like "running your hand into a pincushion of needles," Hoffman said.

Snake teeth are pointed backwards to facilitate swallowing large prey. Their diet consists of rodents, although, according to Hoffman, some snakes are picky eaters.

Hoffman's female boa constrictor will eat almost anything but the male will only eat dead hamsters. His python prefers chickens.

The only real feeding problem Hoffman had was when a new boa constrictor he received as a birthday present ate Iggy, his three-foot iguana.

Snakes make good pets, Hoffman claims. They don't perspire or eat much and they are clean, quiet animals.

Djibouti gains freedom; faces neighbor's threats

DJIBOUTI (AP) — The Republic of Djibouti becomes Africa's 49th independent state at 12:01 a.m. Monday facing almost impossible odds. The tiny new nation has no army of its own, less than one square mile of arable land and no natural resources except sand, salt and 20,000 camels.

But the most immediate threat to Djibouti is the uncertain intentions of its two much bigger Marxist neighbors, Somalia and Ethiopia.

Djibouti, known as French Somaliland and later the Territory of Afars and Issas during 115 years of French colonial rule, is strategically located at the Bab el Mandeb Strait, a 12-mile passage connecting the Suez Canal and the Red Sea with the Gulf of Aden and the Indian Ocean.

About 70 ships a day pass through the strait, including oil tankers and warships of many nations.

ETHIOPIAN leader Lt. Col. Mengistu Haile Mariam told a mass rally in Addis Ababa on Saturday that Somalia has designs on Djibouti, which has an area of 8,000 square miles and a population of 300,000.

Meanwhile, a Syrian newspaper said Ethiopia was massing troops on Djibouti's border for an invasion. There was no confirmation of this report, however.

This seaport has become more important to Ethiopia because that country's northern province of Eritrea, its only sea outlet, is threatened by separatist guerrillas.

Somali President Siad Barre has said it is Mengistu who intends to take over Djibouti and it is the duty of Somalia to defend it.

Despite the volatile atmosphere, Djibouti's new flag, green and blue with a red star, was flying in place of the French tricolor here, and a mild excitement was noticeable among the normally stoic Djiboutians.

THE GOVERNMENT has declared three days of national rejoicing, during which bars and cinemas will be closed. French soldiers and sailors have been confined to barracks to leave the stage to the Djiboutians.

The new government of President Hassan Gouled, 61, has no army of its own, and the French will maintain their 6,500-man force here. How long they will stay will be specified in a new defense agreement with France, to be signed Monday.

France will continue to provide about $142 million a year in aid, along with the technicians and administrators to keep the fledgling republic running.

GOULED SAID his country will be neutral in international affairs. For example, he said, it will join the Arab League but allow Israeli ships to use the strait.

Vietnamese refugees find asylum in Israel

TEL AVIV, Israel (AP) — Sixty-six Vietnamese refugees, turned away by Asian nations after they fled their Communist homeland in a leaking fishing boat, found asylum in Israel on Sunday and were promised jobs, housing and lessons in Hebrew.

Each refugee was given $70, canned food and a packet of tea on arrival. The refugees, some Buddhists but most Roman Catholics, were taken to a hostel in Ofakim in the Negev Desert 75 miles south of Tel Aviv. They were greeted there by welcome signs and a youth band playing "Jerusalem the Golden."

The 34 men, 16 women and 16 children spent four days huddled on a fishing boat, with supplies of food and water running out, when an Israeli freighter plucked them from the South China Sea two weeks ago.

AN ISRAELI official said about half the refugees may be eligible for visas to the United States. Many said they planned to stay in Israel, where they can become citizens in five years under naturalization laws similar to those of the United States. Jews gain automatic citizenship on arrival.

"They will enjoy all hospitality," said Prime Minister Menahem Begin, whose first official act after being sworn in Tuesday was to grant asylum to the Vietnamese. He said their plight evoked memories of Jews fleeing Nazi Germany and being denied entry to Palestine.

Yehudit Huebner, an Interior Ministry official, said this was the first time Israel had received a party of non-Jewish refugees. Israel normally gives no aid to non-Jewish immigrants, but officials said the Vietnamese would receive the same aid offered to Jewish newcomers.

THE REFUGEE group was rejected by Taiwan, Japan and Hong Kong before Israel offered them asylum, and they said at least five ships had passed them by in the sea without offering assistance.

Begin last week called it "a shameful evasion." Former Prime Minister Golda Meir asked, "Would one not rescue a stray dog or a wounded bird?"

The escape began with a 200-mile overland trip under forged travel papers from Saigon, now known as Ho Chi Minh City, to a secret boat launch site on the Vietnamese coast.

"Conditions in Vietnam were unbearable. We feared for our lives," said Dr. Tran. "I couldn't support communism — I suffered too long from them."

Greasy tacos; free speech

The first amendment is again under the gun. This time, however, it's not Al Goldstein or Larry Flynt, it's greasy tacos in Fort Scott.

The incident is sure to enter the courts as a test of the freedom of speech, and it's just that. It's a case of an individual in authority trying to subordinate the free expression of thought. The fact that the controversy centers around greasy tacos in a Kansas High School is irrelevant.

The editor of the Fort Scott High School wrote an editorial criticizing the school cafeteria's greasy tacos.

As a result of the criticism, the journalism teacher who allowed the "insubordinate outburst" was transferred from the journalism department to the English department by the school principal. The principal maintains his actions were not motivated by the fact that his wife works in the cafeteria.

THE POINT, so easily glossed over by the school system, is that the paper is supposed to print only "good news" according to the principal. The paper, he said, should not become an attacking scandal sheet.

That is an unfortunate lesson in journalism.

What principal Weatherbie is practicing is blatant censorship. He is attempting to use his power to harness the flow of free expression and purge any deviating forces from the system.

So he publicly reprimands the faculty adviser of the school paper in the name of proper education and says, in effect, that the first amendment is fine and good providing it keeps its nose out of the educational system.

He certainly cannot succeed in silencing the voice of any newspaper, and the fact he is trying to do just that indicates a disregard for the values and morals of not only his little house of education, but for the concept of the first amendment as well.

Sources flee Washington

John Mitchell, the spunky former attorney general, better known to his new roomies as 24171-157, is at last in jail, or rather, at camp.

The imprisonment of the last Watergater dampens the eyes for many who finally don't have Nixon or Checkers to kick around anymore.

But what now?

With most of the scandals and political brouhahas over, what good does 1977 Washington have for the scores of unnamed sources and sneaky persons who were so popular in Washington in the early '70s?

ACCORDING to a friend of mine, who lives in Washington, they've all left for greener pastures. "It's uncanny," my friend said. "All the unnamed sources and sneaky persons left right after Nixon. I guess they figured they wouldn't be able to find any work."

"Where do you think they all went," I asked.

"Who knows? I heard a few were going up to Baltimore, you heard the Maryland governor is having some trouble keeping out of the courts."

"Yes, I've read about that," I said. "But surely they can't all find work up there, and with all the muckraking and all going on aren't there better opportunities for people that qualified?"

"Sure, but the big shots like Deep Throat and Ellsberg's leak got the real good jobs, like the one that just opened up in Palm Springs."

"You don't mean..."

"Yep, wherever you find a former president or famous person you'll also find a few unnamed sources and sneaky persons," he said.

"But what sort of information or activities could a semi-retired sneaky person or unnamed source engage in in Palm Springs?" I asked. "Just because Ford retired there doesn't mean..."

"You don't really believe," my friend interrupted, "that the same man who fell down more ski slopes than he skied down could have actually shot a hole-in-one by himself, do you?"

"Gosh, I never thought of that. Do you mean he had help?" I asked.

"You could say that," my friend said. "He actually shot a nine on that hole, but an unnamed source leaked it out that he ached it."

I gasped. "You mean the same man who played an important part in dethroning Nixon is now leaking information to the press in Palm Springs?"

"You said that, not me. Did you hear the one about the special prosecutor and the farmer's daughter..."

COLUMBIA, Tenn. — An estimated 40 inmates of the Maury County Jail died Sunday afternoon when a smoky fire broke out in the facility, a hospital spokesman said. Police investigators said as many as 50 may have been killed.

Maury County deputy sheriffs said they believed only four or five prisoners survived the blaze, which they said broke out in a padded cell.

The fire was confined to that cell and the prisoners apparently died of smoke inhalation, said investigators Jerry Dickey and Bob Baucom.

ASSARIA, Kan. — Four members of a Saline County family are dead in the wake of a Saturday evening shooting spree, and although authorities quoted neighbors as saying there had been family trouble for some time, the exact motive for the violent outburst may never be known.

Pat Cardwell, 58, identified by the sheriff's office as the key figure in the apparent case of triple murder and suicide, died early Sunday in a Wichita hospital from an apparently self-inflicted gunshot wound.

OAKLAND — Catcher Jeff Newman had four hits and drove in three runs as the A's defeated the Kansas City Royals 7-3 in the first game of their Sunday doubleheader.

Amos Otis had four of the Royals' 13 hits off A's starter Vida Blue, 5-9, who went seven and one-third innings and got relief help from Bob Lacey and Dave Guisti.

Taxpayers label Carter's tax gift a political ploy

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

President Carter has paid $6,000 in income taxes he did not owe, saying everyone who has a significant income should pay taxes. But Beatrice Davis, one of several American taxpayers who was asked about the gift, says "It's just a big show."

Carter disclosed Friday that he and his wife Rosalynn were due a tax refund of $26,026 on a gross income of $55,000 and owed no taxes for 1976 because of various business and other deductions. But the President asked for only $20,026 back.

"I don't think he should be so bloody big about it," said Monika Huntley, 29, a Sherman Oaks, Calif., housewife. "I think he should go change the tax laws and then he will probably have to pay some taxes and not have all those deductions."

"If he would have given the money to a poor family, maybe in Plains or somewhere else, that really would be something and then I would say, boy, what a nice man," said Mrs. Huntley.

"But to give it to the IRS, which needs it like a hole in the head? It's stupid and I'm quite sure this is purely political."

Woman shares dormitory room with 6-year-old son

By BARBARA RUST
Collegian Reporter

Many people may think Shari Burke is attempting the impossible, but she's getting the job done.

Burke, 29, a master's candidate in curriculum and instruction, lives in Ford Hall with her six-year-old son, Kyle.

My parents and my ex-husband and his parents did not like this situation," she said. "They all said it would be a poor environment for a child, but Kyle has been around adults all his life, anyway."

"I jokingly said to my adviser I'd like to live in a dorm with Kyle so he could get a balanced meal," she said. "My adviser said, 'Why not write K-State and see.'"

TO HER surprise, K-State Housing Office was cooperative and said there would be no problem with Kyle living in the dorm. She was charged the cost of a single room. No matter what residents may say, Burke said, this is cheaper than any apartment. She has never tried this arrangement before, but it is working well. Kyle especially likes living in the dorm.

"He is spoiled. Everybody is so nice to him," Burke said. "He loves living here. He didn't know how he would like to take a bath in the girls' bathroom at first. Now he is used to it."

BURKE RECEIVED her bachelor's degree from the University of Kansas. Kyle, therefore, only thought of KU and Jayhawks, but not anymore.

"I like K-State," he said. "I like the food. I like the friends I've made in the dorm. I like it because it's neat."

"He keeps asking me, 'We don't have to go home yet, do we?'," Burke said. "He already says he wants to come back to K-State. He is not talking KU now."

Burke is completing her master's, funded by the federal teacher corps program. She teaches at an all-black urban elementary school in Kansas City, Kan. The program enables teachers to better reach economically deprived children.

BURKE SAID studying presents no special problems.

"If we go to the library, he packs a bag of soldiers, crayons and paints," she said. "He studies well by himself and is unbelievably creative."

"I got my master's for two reasons," she said. "I wanted to improve myself for better pay. I think women after they get married think the man will take care of her, but that is often a myth."

"A second reason I want my master's is because I'm not going to stay in the classroom the rest of my life. I will go up. I want an administrative job someday."

She advises divorcees not to make any hurried decisions. Most divorcees are unhappy and lonely, she said. This, she believes, is why many quickly remarry.

"The divorcee should wait, sort out his feelings and talk to people," she said. "Don't make any major decisions without thinking about it. If a child is involved, you have to think about what is best for you and the child. Getting my master's will benefit Kyle, too, because I will make more money to support him better."

K-State basketball players qualify for Junior Pan American Games

LeAnn Wilcox, K-State sophomore in journalism, and Tami Romstad, an incoming freshman, qualified for the Junior Pan American Games basketball team at try-outs held at Squaw Valley, Calif.

Wilcox, a 5'8" guard from Kansas City, Mo., was selected for the first team which will play in tournaments at Squaw Valley and Mexico City. Wilcox averaged over 15 points a game for the Wildcats in post-season play last year.

Romstad, a 6'2" center from Independence, Mo., made the second team which will compete in tournaments in Taiwan and Hong Kong. Romstad averaged 20 points and 20 rebounds per game for Truman High School last year.

Wilcox and Romstad are currently in Squaw Valley preparing for the tournaments which will begin July 5 and end during the first week of August.

Wilcox and Romstad join Laurie Miller and Eileen Feeney, who made the World University Games team, to bring the total K-State players participating in international competition this summer to four.

Allocations given for summer school

Five K-State groups submitted budget requests and received summer school student activity fees this year.

After submitting a proposed budget and participating in a budget hearing before the Summer Allocations Board, allocations were given to the following groups: Union, $22,500; Rec Services, $4,500; Summer Artists Series, $3,000; Student Publications, $6,500 and University for Man, $1,851.

The possibility of a summer activity fee increase has been discussed. If this recommendation is presented by SGA finance committee, it will be acted on by Student Senate next spring and could go into effect in the summer of 1978, according to the board's report.

Theater group schedules visit

The Free Street Theater of Chicago, a group of young professional actors, singers, dancers, musicians, writers and technicians will hold a two-day residency in Manhattan Wednesday and Thursday.

The group, which stresses audience participation and community involvement, develops original theatrical experiences dealing with the contemporary American lifestyle.

The resident workshops and seminars are open to area teachers and community members interested in various facets of the arts. All activities will take place at the City Park Pavilion.

There will be a teacher seminar and a puppetry workshop from 1 p.m. to 3 p.m. Wednesday. From 3 p.m. to 5 p.m. a dance class will be held with a performance at 8:30 p.m. at Arts in the Park. The Thursday schedule is the same, except for the addition of a 1 p.m. Afro-Cuban dance workshop.

Free Street Theater is a Mid-America Arts Alliance (M-AAA) project supported through regional partnership by M-AAA, the National Endowment for the Arts and the art agencies of Arkansas, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska and Oklahoma. The local sponsor is the Manhattan Recreation Commission.

New child care facility will provide full day care

By DIANE GONZOLAS
Collegian Reporter

When the Stone House Center begins operation this fall it will become the third child care facility established by the K-State Department of Family and Child Development.

"We feel fortunate to have three fine programs which will be operating this fall," said Faye Ann Price, acting director of the child care programs in the department. "Our department likes to be responsive to the needs of the University and the community."

The Stone House Center will provide full day care including meals and provisions for napping. There will be 30 children from 18 months to five years of age enrolled in the program.

IVALEE MCCORD, a member of the Child Care Committee of the Commission on the Status of Women, believes her committee may have been somewhat instrumental in helping the Stone House Center to become a reality.

To support the planned center, the committee used a child care petition which was circulated in the K-State Union in December. They also used a study done at Jardine Terrace by five students in a research methods class taught by Stephan Bollman, professor of family and child development. The petition and the study revealed an unmet need for child care for K-State student-parents.

The two other programs in operation are the Child Development Laboratory and the Infant and Child Care Center.

THE CHILD Development Lab has two-hour sessions in the morning and afternoon, Monday through Friday. There are 16 children three to five years old in each session. This summer, the lab has a morning session Monday through Thursday.

The Infant and Child Care Center offers care for 15 children from six months to five-years-old. This center, geared towards the student parent, enrolls children in either morning or afternoon sessions according to their parent's class schedule.

"We feel we have a pretty top-notch staff," Price said. "In each of the centers we have supervising teachers who are instructors in family and child development. One of these people head each program."

"Working with them are graduate teaching assistants," she said. "We also have student teachers who are working on their degrees." The Stone House, however, will have a bachelors-level full-time teacher, Price said.

"The programs are both instructional and a help to the children," Price said. The facilities are used for training teachers of children, for student observation and for research to explore methods of child care.

Parental involvement is stressed in all three programs. Conferences and education sessions are scheduled for the parents and an attempt is made to visit each home.

The University For Man (UFM) evening child care center is also working on expansion. A $6,000 federal community development grant will be available to the center if certain guidelines are met.

"We need to prove 85 per cent of our clientele is in the poverty level," said Laurie Stull, the UFM center's director. "We are in the process of doing that now and increasing our clientele."

THE GRANT would enable the UFM center to pay for rent, advertising and Stull's wages for six months. After the six months, the center hopes to be self-sufficient.

The center is open from 6 p.m. to 11 p.m. Monday through Thursday and 6 p.m. Friday to 1 a.m. Saturday. Reservations are needed. Stull said the center can accommodate 18 children.

Stull's experience includes caring for emotionally disturbed and disadvantaged children and children classified as having deviant behavior. She has a B.A. degree in child psychology and social welfare from California State University at Chico.

"We do a lot of really positive things with the children," she said. The center uses Montessori beliefs and equipment and has a nursery school setting. It accepts children from two-and-a-half to twelve-years younger children, UFM has a list of babysitters.

Wheat excesses, low prices causes mortgage of crops

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Faced with low prices and a continuing wheat surplus, a growing number of farmers are mortgaging their crops to the government, putting the grain in storage in hopes of a better deal later on.

They are taking advantage of a government loan program that allows them up to 11 months to redeem the wheat and sell it on the open market.

"There's going to be very heavy use of it (the loan program)," said Carl Schwensen of the National Wheat Growers Association. "There will be a significant increase over last year."

Consumers are unlikely to see any effect from the farmers' actions. Wheat itself accounts for only a small part of the cost of most food items. There are only a few cents worth of wheat, for example, in a 40-cent loaf of bread.

CURRENT PRICES for wheat are less than $2 a bushel in many areas. Schwensen said the cost of producing a bushel of wheat currently runs from $3.30 to $3.60. The government will lend farmers $2.25 a bushel on a nationwide average. The farmers pay interest on the loan at the rate of 6 per cent a year. They must also pay for storing the wheat, and Schwensen said storage fees generally average about 30-cents a bushel.

If the price of wheat goes above $2.25, the farmers can take back their wheat, sell it and repay the loans. If the price remains below $2.25, the farmers can choose not to repay the loans and the Commodity Credit Corp. (CCC) of the U.S. Department of Agriculture assumes ownership of the grain. The CCC may sell the wheat or store it until needed.

PRICES IN recent years have been higher than the government loan level and farmers have mortgaged little of their crops to the CCC.

Only a small amount of grain has ended up under government ownership. As of April 30, the CCC owned only 244,000 bushels of wheat compared to more than one billion bushels in the period from 1961 to 1963.

The situation may be changing, however. As of June 1, the start of the wheat marketing year, there was a carryover of wheat from previous crops of over 1.1 billion bushels, more than double the amount used in the United States for food every year. The carryover was higher than at any time since June 1, 1963.

The 1977 wheat crop, now being harvested, is expected to top two billion bushels for the third straight year. Schwensen said crops in other parts of the world also are expected to be abundant.

"There's an oversupply of wheat in the world," he said. Schwensen said discussions are under way among exporting and importing nations to work out an orderly production arrangement to avoid "boom or bust" cycles. "Everyone's hopeful something can be arranged, but it's only at the very beginning stages," he said.

GOVERNMENT statistics on loan activity will not be available until the middle of next month. USDA officials also say it is normal for farmers to take out loans at harvest time so they have ready cash while they survey the market.

An Associated Press spot check of the wheat belt shows, however, that other farm spokesmen agree with Schwensen that the number of loans will be greater than normal.

"This is the first time since 1969 that the loan price was above the market price," said Gary Fair, director of the federal Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service in Sumner County, Kan. He said he expected 2,000 to 2,500 loans would be made on wheat in Sumner, traditionally the largest wheat-producing county in the state. Last year, only 700 loans were made.

Wheat prices in Kansas averaged $1.94 a bushel last month, compared to $3.25 a bushel a year earlier.

Earl Hayes, president of the Kansas Association of Wheat Growers, noted that farmers have until next March 31 to apply for a loan on 1977 wheat.

"A lot of them will kind of wait and see. As they need funds, they will either seel it (the wheat) or take a loan."

SCHWENSEN said he believed most farmers were "basically optimistic and looking forward to improved prices," rather than final government ownership of the wheat. He admitted, however, "it's going to take some shortfall in a major producing country" to reverse the supply-demand situation and boost prices.

He also said there was a possibility the 11-month term of the government loans might be extended. The USDA already has announced a program whereby farmers can store about 300 million bushels of the 1976 crop for up to three years.

Judge sets date for Holiwell trial

Judge Jerry Mershon Monday set August 3 as the trial date for Jerome Holiwell, of Manhattan, who is accused of participating in the March 30 gang rape of a K-State co-ed in the athletic dorm.

Mershon overruled a motion by Riley County Attorney Dennis Sauter that the state consolidate the trials of Holiwell and Roy Shine of Lynwood Calif., who also is accused of participating in the rape.

Shine's trial is scheduled to begin Aug. 2.

Court allows lawyers to advertise

WASHINGTON (AP) — In a decision that could lead to lower prices and more information for consumers, the Supreme Court ruled Monday that lawyers may advertise fees for routine services such as uncontested divorces and drawing up wills.

K-State landmarks included in facelift

An $8 million facelift is planned for K-State's old dairy barn and surrounding area.

Plans call for a new plant pathology building, reconstruction of the conservatory, new greenhouses and renovation of the barn itself. Following renovation, the historic stone barn will be shared by the plant science, entomology, plant pathology and horticulture departments.

In front of the building, formal gardens, laced with foot and bicycle paths are planned.

The new plant science building, Throckmorton Hall, will be built in the approximate area of the putting greens. New greenhouses will be built adjacent to the barn. The existing greenhouse will be torn down.

THE OLD conservatory, which dates to 1903, will be moved to a site just northwest and adjacent to the barn. A new education-psychology building will be built on the old site north of Justin.

"Most of the plants have already been moved out to temporary boxes built by the physical plant," said Richard Mattson, associate professor of horticulture. "We'll lose some of the plants in the move, we're sure." Of particular concern is a banana tree, believed to date back to the 1890s.

THE FOUNDATION and some other work on the conservatory will be done by K-State's physical plant. Bids will be taken for the actual moving.

The rose garden will also be moved from the old conservatory site.

African art draws teacher to Nigeria

Angelo Garzio, ceramic artist and art professor, will be spending the coming school year as a guest lecturer at Ahmadu Bello University, Zaria, Nigeria.

Garzio, recipient of a Fulbright Senior Lectureship Grant, leaves in August to coordinate African ceramic studies and conduct research on African ceramic art.

K-State ends a 13-year contract with Ahmadu Bello University Thursday. As part of the program, K-State provided agricultural and veterinary medicine educational assistance to the University and to Nigeria.

"I see my role as a lecturer to try to promote and encourage my African students to a stronger consciousness of their own art tradition," Garzio said.

In his research, Garzio plans to investigate the different craft media such as pottery, weaving and crafts. He also will be conducting classes at Ahmadu Bello University in designing and creating of ceramics.

Garzio previously held a Fulbright-Hays Senior Scholarship to Hong Ik University in Seoul, Korea, and visiting art professor positions in Finland, Germany, Washington and Minnesota.

The 5-4 ruling struck at one of the legal profession's longest and most sacred traditions — that lawyers do not openly peddle their services in the marketplace.

It could bring about major changes in the practice of law and also in the medical profession which clings to similar traditions and rules against price advertising.

The ruling overturned an Arizona Supreme Court rule prohibiting lawyers from advertising. Virtually all states have similar rules enforced by the state courts and bar associations.

THE COURT majority said the constitutional issue "is only whether the state may prevent the publication in a newspaper of the attorneys' truthful advertisement concerning the availability and terms of routine legal services.

To ban such advertisements violates the First Amendment guarantee of free speech, the court said.

Writing for the majority, Justice Harry Blackmun stressed the decision applies only to the narrow area of advertising fees for relatively simple legal work.

"The only services that lend themselves to advertising are the routine ones: the uncontested divorce, the simple adoption, the uncontested personal bankruptcy, the change of name, and the like," he wrote.

The court will wait for another day to consider whether broader types of ads, such as boasts about the best service in town, might be banned, he added. However, he suggested that "such claims may be so likely to be misleading as to warrant restriction."

CASTING ITS decision as a boon for consumers, the majority said the advertising ban has made it difficult for shoppers to find out which lawyer offers acceptable service at the lowest cost.

The prohibition "likely has served to burden access to legal services, particularly for the not-poor and the unknowledgeable," Blackmun wrote.

"Advertising does not provide a complete foundation on which to select an attorney," Blackmun conceded. "But it seems peculiar to deny the consumer . . . at least some of the relevant information needed to reach an informed decision."

Justice William Powell, a former ABA president, complained in a dissent that allowing lawyers to advertise fees will be misleading to the public.

"Some lawyers may gain temporary advantages; others will suffer from the economic power of stronger lawyers, or by the subtle deceit of less scrupulous lawyers. Some members of the public may benefit marginally, but the risk is that many others will be victimized by simplistic price advertising. . . ." Powell asserted.

COLUMBIA, Tenn. — Arson investigators say the thick smoke that killed 42 persons in a jail fire here apparently contained cyanide — and a state fire official wondered how many jails in the country also have cells padded with the materials that produced the smoke.

Tom Copeland, chief of fire protection for the state fire marshal's office, said Monday that the cell padding was poly-vinyl chloride over foam plastic — difficult to burn, he said, but dangerous once it starts.

"We took blood samples from eight people and in three of them there were relatively high levels of cyanide," Copeland said. "All of them also showed high levels of lethal carbon monoxide."

"We thought we had a fire-proof jail," said Sheriff Bill Voss. "But that fire had gotten so far along that it completely obscured vision."

Voss said the Sunday afternoon fire, during visiting hours, was set by Andrew Zimmer, 16, of Superior, Wis., who was picked up Saturday morning and found to be a runaway from a Wisconsin home for emotionally disturbed teenagers.

In all, 34 inmates and eight visitors died in Sunday's fire. Most inmates were awaiting trial and had not been convicted of anything.

When Zimmer's cell caught fire, he was dragged to safety. But the smoke spread quickly and in the darkness and confusion, a set of keys that could have unlocked cells was dropped and lost for a few vital minutes. Meanwhile, prisoners were choking to death in their cells.

WASHINGTON — The Carter administration believes that the Soviet Union sees U.S. influence increasing around the world and that this accounts for the current friction in U.S. relations with Moscow.

But the administration considers the tension a temporary — and inevitable — result of shifts in U.S. policy since President Carter took office. It also sees the strains as stemming from an improved perception of the United States around the globe since the end of the Vietnam War.

It is felt here that elements in the Moscow leadership see the changes in U.S. policy as threatening to the Soviet Union, and that the strains in the U.S. Soviet relationship accompany the Russians' attempts to accommodate changes they see as undesirable.

WASHINGTON — The House Ways and Means Committee approved a tax credit of up to $400 Monday for persons who insulate and weatherize their existing homes. A tax credit of up to $2,150 was voted for those who use the sun or wind as an energy source.

And, agreeing with President Carter that there can be no national energy policy without sacrifice, the committee voted to repeal the income tax deductions for state and local gasoline taxes.

If upheld by Congress, elimination of the deduction would mean a tax increase averaging $38 for 18.6 million couples or individuals — all of whom itemize deductions — in 1978. The tax hike would be double that figure by 1985.

TOPEKA — Gov. Robert Bennett made good on his promise to pay surprise visits to Kansas nursing homes, making unannounced stops at new north central homes Monday, Bennett's office announced.

The governor was accompanied by Dwight Metzler, secretary of Health and Environment, and Beth Shroeder, a nurse.

Submarines may bring icebergs to dry countries

PARIS (AP)— A Saudi prince and a French polar explorer said Monday international experts will gather in the United States this fall to consider using nuclear submarines to tow icebergs to water short countries.

They also told a news conference at the end of a two-day "International Symposium on Icebergs" that insurance companies have indicated willingness to insure iceberg transporters against risks including hijacking.

Since 1975, Saudi Arabia has been considering schemes to bring icebergs from the Antarctic to the Red Sea to provide water for the desert oil kingdom. Icebergs are salt-free and melt as fresh water.

Prince Mohamed al Faisal al Saud, head of the Saudi Saline Water Conversion Corp. and president of a new million-dollar firm called Iceberg Transport International (ITI), and French polar explorer Paul-Emile Victor said symposium participants were favorably impressed by the proposed iceberg venture.

They said while towing an iceberg with five ocean-going tugs was the transport method first advanced, a better way to move the huge iceblock would be to have a specially equipped nuclear submarine push at a depth of about 131 feet.

Hypocrisy abounds; health vs. profit

It's the little things the federal government does which really irritate taxpayers.

Like spending huge sums of money trying to get people to stop smoking through massive Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) advertising, then subsidizing tobacco growers to make cigarettes cheaper.

It happens when you have two devoted and talented men like Joseph Califano, pushing for the country's health and welfare, and Bob Bergland, championing the rights of agriculture.

But why must so much money be spent to cancel out the efforts of two executive cabinets?

Taking the two on their own merits, the logical candidate for federal support would be HEW. It's clear that cigarettes are indeed harmful and the government should discourage smoking in the name of better health for the country.

Enough federal money has been spent to determine the hazards of cigarette smoking to make tobacco subsidies hypocritical.

AGRICULTURE Secretary Bob Bergland is only doing his job. He is paid to represent the interests of agriculture. Other growers receive federal subsidies, so, the tobacco industry argues, why shouldn't tobacco growers? Bergland argues that halting tobacco subsidies wouldn't stop smoking, but would ruin almost half a million farmers.

Califano, on the other hand, says the government shouldn't make emphysema, cancer and heart disease more economical than they already are.

Bergland responds with this: If tobacco kills, it shouldn't even be on the market at all.

Again, each man is doing his job. They are presenting logical arguments and are advising the President as best they can. Unfortunately, this is a case where the interests of one cabinet stumbled across the interests of another, and they don't see eye-to-eye.

So, in its maternal sort of way, the government gives each credit for points earned, and winds up paying for no smoking programs and keeps tobacco growers afloat as well.

If you listen to either Bergland or Califano and not to the other, it's likely each could convince you his argument is better. That, apparently, is what has happened.

Good sense won't allow both groups to reap federal money for much longer. It's clear that we need to stop smoking more than we need cheaper cigarettes. The government should stop the embarrassing situation by halting tobacco subsidies if for no other reason than for the benefit of American society.

The art of mastering tests

Aaaagggghh!!! Tests. We've been taking them since first grade, generally disliking them and constantly swearing at them.

The fear of tests has been perpetuated by inept instructors who dwell on minutia and by the lack of instruction on how to take a test. But, lo and behold, someone has given us a clue, a light at the dark end of the test-taking tunnel.

Human Behavior magazine has performed a tremendous public service in publishing their article "How to Pass Without Actually Cheating." Here are some of the gems of advice they imparted.

"The testwise student... is systematic," they say. He formulates a theory about what is going to be on the test, what the instructor expects.

The student should not begin answering the questions until he has thoroughly looked over the test.

THEN, they continue, a methodical series of steps follows.

1) Discovering the modus operandi — if the questions are designed to trap, watch out for apparently simple answers. If the questions ask you to impart knowledge and applicability of basic principles, an oversimplification is usually the answer.
2) Playing the odds— there are usually (but after this is published, probably not always) more true responses on a true-false test.

3) Finding verbal clues—If there is a repetition of words in the question and response, there is a clue. "Never" and "always" seldom will appear in the correct answer.

4) recognizing ranking and orderings—If the question calls for rankings, dates or quantities, the correct response will seldom be either extreme, but the answer will often fall in the middle.

5) Looking for mechanical clues—The question may contain the answer. A precisely stated response may be the correct answer, since the instructor may be attempting to avoid ambiguity.

THESE HELPFUL hints are applicable to multiple choice and true-false tests, but what about those horrible essay tests?

Aha! Even on those regurgitation specials, there is a way to "beat the system," according to the magazine.

Direct your essay response to the question, following your statement with a logical and consistent argument. Develop a thesis and stick with it.

The student who is testwise will write a clearly defined introduction with bold assertions. The body of the essay will support all assertions. The conclusion will reiterate the thesis and provide specific examples.

The instructor will often be impressed with a considered, logical — and well written — argument, no matter how much rhetorical bull it contains.

A great vote of thanks is directed to Human Behavior magazine for their thorough and enlightening article on test-taking. Now, let us hope that not many instructors read this column.

Fights can be fun

Fighting is good for the soul. It clears the air and helps situations fall into perspective. Fighting can induce necessary changes and bring into focus the little things which bother you about someone or something else.

There are many ways one can fight. The most destructive fights are with fists. Arguing is a much safer way (at least physically) and can be constructively accomplished.

There are many ways to learn the fine art of arguing. There are classes such as the University For Man's Creative Conflict and segments of K-State classes such as Family Relations and Human Development are devoted to arguing.

IN ONE recent magazine article, it is suggested you state your primary reaction first, such as "I am hurt," instead of "I am angry." You are angry because you are hurt, not the other way around.

By stating how you feel, the other person cannot argue with you. If you feel hurt, no argument will convince you you are not hurt. After all, it is your feeling and no one else can possibly know how you feel.

Another way to argue is to state the facts as you see them, such as, "I believe I was stood up last night. I thought we had a date."

From his response, you can find out what he thought the facts were and go from there. You can accept his apology, or you can scream and holler about how inconsiderate he is.

UNFORTUNATELY, we turn to screaming too often as a form of argument. A nice, simple, heated discussion serves the same purpose and might accomplish more.

A ploy women use is to cry. This creates a guilty feeling, which may not provide constructive results.

Crying seldom solves the bigger problems. Tell the person who did it to cause you to cry. Some men don't understand they have hurt you unless you tell them, so don't be afraid to speak out.

Remember, fighting can be beneficial for you, whether it is with your roommate, your boyfriend or girlfriend, or even your parents. An argument can bring about changes and help clear the air.

Child abuse awareness is increasing

Editors note: This is the first in a two-part series on child abuse.

By DEBBIE BURKLAND
Collegian Reporter

Billy bruised his arms and legs when he was trying to crawl out of his crib his parents said. Billy is only three months old. He won't begin to crawl for several months.

The public is becoming increasingly aware of signals of child abuse and neglect.

"We are receiving more calls from parents now than ever before," said Mike Brenn, intake worker for the Social and Rehabilitation Services (SRS) in Manhattan. However, he did not attribute this increase to a parallel increase in abuse, but to public awareness of the situation.

LAST APRIL and May, the Manhattan office received 28 complaints of abuse or neglect. In the last five years they have received about 370 calls. Brenn said many of these are serious concerns.

"We do get some crank calls by friends, relatives and neighbors to get the parents in trouble," he said. In most of these situations there is actually no neglect or abuse in the home. Brenn said the average is between 10 to 20 complaints each month.

"Other areas are roughly about the same in regards to the size of the community," he said.

Brenn said because of Manhattan's location the cases are a little more "unusual" than other vicinities.

"We have the college and Ft. Riley," he said, "and about half of our cases are related to the military somehow," Brenn said.

NANCY WESTLING, protective service worker for Riley and Pottawatomie counties, said she handles about 40 cases, including foster care and some juvenile supervision for youths. This figure is on the low end of the scale, according to Brenn.

"Anything from 35 to 60 would be a reasonably average caseload," he said. The Manhattan district has two protective service workers, Westling and Betty Banner. Brenn is the only intake worker in the district.

Parents who abuse children fall under several categories, Brenn said. The most widely publicized is the mentally ill parent whose every action is exaggerated. Parents who are emotionally deprived often abuse their children and expect these children to fill a missing part in their roles, according to Brenn.

INADEQUATE parents, such as very young parents or single parent families, also show more potential for abuse. Both Brenn and Graham Rose, local pediatrician, say many parents need to be educated on parenting and would like to see such instruction in the future.

Children who are retarded or handicapped in some way frequently become scapegoats for parents. Siblings often pick up on this and the child is used as a scapegoat for all of the family's problems, Brenn said.

ALCOHOL and drugs also influence child abuse and neglect.

"The more frequent the use of alcohol or drugs, the more likely the child will be subjected, if not to direct physical abuse, to possible mental abuse and many times neglect," Brenn said. He said neglect is severe in most cases, especially with extreme alcoholism.

"These are cases where we have to watch out for parents who try to introduce their child to alcohol or drugs," Brenn said.

Rose said in all states physicians must report every case of child abuse. In the Kansas Register maintained by the Maternal and Child Health Division of the State Health Department, physicians represent the largest group reporting abuse of very young children.

Intersession class journeys to Mexico

Four K-State coeds huddled in the back seat of the VW van. Coooned in sleeping bags and surrounded by foam padding, the four girls slept despite the freezing temperature.

John Eads, instructor in biology teaches an intersession class every semester in which students travel "en caravan" to Mexico to study marine biology and natural history.

"It's mainly to let students interested in marine biology get a chance to study it when normally they could not," Eads said.

"The University of Arizona has a marine station at Puerto Penasco in Sonora, Mexico, which they lend to us to use," Eads said. "Through this station students can set up experiments and use the laboratories to aid in their studies."

THE LIMIT of students able to attend the class is 25 and the prerequisites are organismic biology or permission from Eads.

During intersession last May, the students traveled 400 miles south of the Mexican border following the Sea of Cortez shoreline.

"We visited Seri Indian villages," Eads said. "There are only about 250 survivors of this race left."

"They carve ironwood, a wood so hard that it doesn't float and often sparks when being carved vigorously, but only the elders of the tribe carve so it's dying out," Eads said.

"Even so, we traded away our clothing, knives and boots to get pieces of carved ironwood," he said.

ON THE WAY back to the U.S., Eads directed the students to a bat cave in Mexico.

"The temperature outside the cave was a stifling 118 degrees," Eads said. "The cave was inside a volcanic cone and we had to crawl down a steep decline."

"Inside we saw thousands of bats clinging to the walls, some of them even nursing," Eads said. "I felt this uncontrollable urge to hang by my feet."

"After we got out and evening came, the bats swarmed out. It took an hour and a half for over one million bats to fly out."

Americans live by double standard

By CHRIS WILLIAMS
Staff Writer

Why is it that Americans don't like outspoken winners?

The world of sports, perhaps, has the greatest abundance of followers who expect their heroes to be brash during competition, but quiet off the field.

Muhammed Ali is probably the best example of this double standard. For years fans adored Joe Frazier and judged him a better boxer than Ali, even though Ali has beaten Frazier twice and is still the heavyweight champion of the world. The reason for Frazier's popularity is he was the quiet, unassuming athlete who pursued his career quietly and led the life of a family man.

Ali, on the other hand, spoke honestly and stood up for what he believed. He felt himself to be the best fighter in the world and refused to fight a pointless war in Indochina.

For this he was stripped of his title and fans immediately compared him to Benedict Arnold and vowed to live unhappily until they saw the day Ali beaten.

ANOTHER athlete fans love to see falter is Joe Namath. Because of his flamboyant life style and a taste for Scotch, Namath has been ridiculed and ostracized for his interceptions and losses as a New York Jet quarterback.

People seem to forget that Namath had to throw from behind a porous Jet offensive line and he cannot move as fast as a Steve Grogan or a Roger Staubach because of two bad knees.

When he guaranteed the victory over the Colts in the 1969 Super Bowl, people said he was too cocky and that they would like nothing better than to see the Jets annihilated in the Super Bowl.

You can bet that these same people are hoping to see him fail as a Los Angeles Ram.

And the late Steve Prefontaine, maybe the best distance runner this country has produced, was forever hounded as the bad boy of American track because of outspoken views.

PREFONTAINE thought the Amateur Athletic Union was a farce and used the athletes. When he told people what he thought, he was labeled a big mouth and a bad influence on younger athletes.

Ironically, probably every persons who despised Prefontaine cheered for him to do well at the Munich Olympics because he was representing the United States.

These are only a few examples of how hypocritical the American people are. They want their athletes to be tough on the field, yet quiet off. And when they do mention their views, they are labeled a bad influence for the young people and should not be listened to.

Sports

Ali recently purchased a home for Houston McTear, the poverty stricken world recordholder in the 100-yard dash. By purchasing a new home for the McTears, Ali relieved some of the pressure that accompanies poverty.

NAMATH annually conducts football camps so that he might transmit some of his vast knowledge of the game of football to kids. Namath admits that one of his biggest thrills was handing out candy to kids on Halloween when they came to his home in Long Island.

And Prefontaine loved to answer kids' letters and offer advice to them on how to become better athletes. It was a shame that he was killed before he could help some more.

The hypocrisy lies in the fact that many of these same people who dislike outspoken athletes sit around sipping Scotch, regretting our involvement in Indochina, complaining about conditions in the United States and hoping that the kids who were bothering them would go away.

Winston pursues coaching career

By EUGENE PERKINS
Collegian Reporter

Darryl Winston, whose rugged play against centers sometimes three or more inches taller helped K-State win the Big Eight basketball title last year, will be back this fall, not as a player, but as a graduate assistant to head coach Jack Hartman.

"My duties will include coaching the junior varsity and assisting Coach Hartman and the rest of the staff with the varsity in any way possible," Winston said.

The Lovejoy, Ill., native is one semester short of graduating, so he will also be taking two or three classes next year to complete his degree in social work and psychology.

"It's hard to graduate on time when you're playing ball," Winston said. "Especially with a double major." After receiving his degrees, Winston plans to work for his masters degree in social work.

ALTHOUGH Winston enjoys his studies, he says his first love is coaching.

"I became interested in coaching while watching my brother, Warren, coach high school basketball in the St. Louis area," Winston said.

"Coach Hartman's coaching has helped me tremendously," he said. "That's why I applied to stay here as graduate assistant. I felt this would be the best start in coaching I could get."

Winston said he hopes the experience he gains by working at K-State will lead to an assistant coaching position at the collegiate level.

Professional basketball does not figure into Winston's plans at the moment.

"If I had the opportunity to play pro ball I would probably pursue it," Winston said. "But my coaching career looks much brighter."

K-State fans can look forward to a good, well-balanced team next year, Winston said.

"With the five good freshmen coming in, plus the nucleus they have returning from last year, they'll be real tough," Winston said.

KC teacher ruling overturned

KANSAS CITY (AP)—A circuit court judge exceeded his authority in prohibiting the Kansas City School District from firing teachers for participating in a 54-day strike, the Missouri Court of Appeals ruled Monday.

Judge Jack Pritchard wrote in his opinion that Judge Lewis Clymer of Jackson County Circuit Court wrongly invaded the powers of control over district personnel matters.

The court said Clymer's order May 6 had the practical effect of ending the strike by the Kansas City Federation of Teachers but that Clymer exceeded his jurisdiction in ordering the district to take no reprisals against employees involved in the strike.

The ruling was regarded as a victory for the school district, which had claimed that Clymer's ruling usurped his powers under state law. School officials were not immediately available for comment.

CLYMER'S order was an amendment to a temporary injunction against the strike and directed teachers to return to the classroom and the district not to discriminate against employees who participated in the strike unless it was proven that the employee engaged in "violent acts causing physical injury to persons or damage to property."

The school district terminated one tenured teacher but said earlier it planned to seek termination of 20 or more other tenured teachers for acts during the strike. The school district also did not issue new contracts to 100 or more probationary teachers who participated in the strike.

The tenured teacher who was terminated was accused of puncturing the tires of a non-striking teacher. He has appealed the termination to the school board.

Family grows earthworms at home

By MARY LOU PETER
Collegian Reporter

Elaine and Bob Kramer are farmers. There is not a wheat farm, nor is there a cow to be found on the place. The Kramers operate an earthworm farm.

The Kramers, whose daughter Joyce is a senior in accounting at K-State, "farm" at their Basehor, Kan. home. The operation is set up in their garage and basement.

"About a year ago I had read an article about uses of earthworms and how it could be a profitable business," Elaine Kramer said. She works as a nurse in Kansas City, Kan., but plans to retire soon.

After "a lot of talk," Bob, now retired, agreed to give the earthworm business a try. With an initial investment of $3,000, the Kramers became vermiculturists (worm farmers) last February. Most people believe the major use of worms is fish bait. Actually, more are used in land reclamation, according to the Kramers.

"They clean the garbage out of the earth," Elaine Kramer said.

ACCORDING TO the book, "Earthworms for Ecology and Profit," by Ronald Gaddie and Donald Douglas, earthworms naturally convert organic waste into very effective fertilizer. As soil aerators and fertilizer-converters with a life span of more than 15 years, the authors say earthworms add longer value to the soil than commercial fertilizers.

Although the initial investment seems high, very little cash is required later, the Kramers said.

They started with four beds and 100,000 worms per bed. The beds average $642 each, which includes shipping costs from California. Additional costs are for lumber used to make the bed frames and worm feed.

Feed may consist of kitchen garbage, sewer sludge, nut meals or commercial feeds. Sewer sludge is very beneficial to worms, but "that's where I draw the line," Elaine Kramer said.

The Kramers' feed costs are about 13 cents per bed per week. Bedding consists of leached (washed) horse manure, obtained free from a nearby stable. Leaching with a hose removes the urine, thus the smell.

MANY PEOPLE joke about their venture, Elaine Kramer said.

The Kramers' main goal now is to produce as many worms as possible. Earthworms are hermaphrodites (bisexual), so every adult worm is capable of laying eggs.

"It's important not to get the beds overcrowded," Elaine Kramer said, "because worms can become cannibalistic."

The beds are split periodically, leaving half the worms in one bed and moving the rest.

In September, the Kramers plan to harvest. This involves removing the larger adult worms and fattening them for market. Fattening takes about two weeks and twice as much feed. Although their harvesting will be done manually, there are machines that shake the small worms to the bottom leaving the large ones on top.

WORMS are bought by the pound, so the fatter the worms, the larger the profits, Elaine Kramer said.

Although easy to raise and fairly maintenance-free, some hazards exist in earthworm farming.

There are worm rustlers, according to Elaine Kramer, and for this reason their garage is always locked.

Sour-crop, a type of protein poisoning can result from improper feeding and may be fatal to the worms. The Kramers said they check the pH (acidity or alkalinity) of the beds consistently.

"Vibrations really upset earthworms," Elaine Kramer said. "A thunderstorm's vibrations can cause the worms to crawl right out of their beds."

THE OPTIMUM temperature for the worm bed is 70 degrees. Excessive heat or cold will also cause them to crawl to the bed surface or crawl out.

"The worms will stay in the beds as long as they are comfortable there," Elaine said.

Maintenance requires feeding about three times a week, periodically wetting down the beds, checking pH and aerating the beds by turning the manure.

"It sounds like a lot of work but it isn't," Bob Kramer said. "We really only spend about an hour a day with it." They expect to have 100 beds from the original four by next summer.

With each worm capable of producing 1,200 to 1,500 offspring a year, the Kramers have invested in six acres where they intend to move their operation. Plans call for a new van to transport their "crop" and a new barn to house them.

Donors needed for bloodmobile

The Red Cross Bloodmobile will be in Manhattan next week to receive blood from persons interested in donating.

The bloodmobile will be located at College Avenue United Methodist Church, 1609 College Avenue. On Tuesday, July 5, the bloodmobile will be accepting donations from 2 p.m. to 7:15 p.m. On Wednesday, July 6, the bloodmobile hours will be 9 a.m. to 2:15 p.m.

The Red Cross has set their goal for the two days at 300 pints of blood, said Marcia Bayes, chairman of the bloodmobile drive.

Donors receive a card for recording donations which shows their blood type. The holder of a card and any member of his family is entitled to receive blood at processing cost, which is about $16.32 a pint. Without a donation card, a person must pay about $40 to $50 a pint.

The donated blood is processed and divided into blood serum and blood cells. The serum is frozen and can be kept up to three years and is of important use to cancer and leukemia patients.

To donate blood a person must be 17 years of age, 110 pounds, and can't have donated blood in the last two months.

Short cuts risk threat of botulism

With recent cases of botulism in Michigan, the necessity of using scientific processes for canning food in the home is increased said Jean Caul, professor of foods and nutrition.

"Botulism is a dreadful kind of food poisoning," Caul said. "It takes eight to 72 hours after eating food that contains the botulism toxin for it (the poison) to occur."

Early signs of botulism are weakness, dizziness, blurred vision and vomiting.

"Home canning looks simple, but attention to every detail is essential to the retention of nutrients and to safety," Caul said.

"Many younger people have gone through the safe period of buying commercial canned goods. Then they go right ahead and take short cuts when they can food, not knowing the risks they are running," Caul said.

A SCIENTIFIC basis for the safe canning of food with low acid content was established more than 30 years ago, and Caul said, since then only five botulism deaths have been attributed to the more than 800 billion containers of commercially canned foods.

According to Caul, commercially canned goods have troubles, too.

"You should never buy a can with a dent, bulge, or break," Caul said. "It allows bacteria to get in and gives the toxin time to set up."

Court denies Nixon attempt to control tapes, documents

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court on Tuesday rebuffed Richard Nixon's attempt to gain control of the 880 tape recordings and 42 million pages of documents left behind when he was forced from the presidency.

The justices, voting 7 to 2, ruled that Congress acted constitutionally in 1974 when it passed a law allowing the government to decide which materials may be controlled by Nixon and which may be made public.

The decision is the first step toward allowing the public access to most of the materials, a process that would take years and is sure to spark more lawsuits by the former president who resigned Aug. 9, 1974, in the wake of the Watergate scandals.

Included in the 5,000 hours of tape recordings are the 30 reels of tape played during the Watergate cover-up trial of Nixon's closest aides.

There was no immediate comment from Nixon. An aide at Nixon's home in San Clemente, Calif., and a lawyer here said they would not comment before reading the court's full decision.

IN SEATTLE, the former president's daughter said the court ruling means that her father will be the only ex-president not to have access to his administration's documents.

Julie Nixon Eisenhower made her comment in a radio interview after persistent questioning. She did not elaborate.

The court rejected five specific claims by Nixon's attorneys that the 1974 law, called the Presidential Materials and Recordings Preservation Act, was unconstitutional.

The court said the act did not violate the separation of powers between the legislative branches of government, did not violate Nixon's privacy or his presidential privilege of confidentiality, and did not significantly interfere with his rights of association.

The justices also ruled that the law was not an illegal "bill of attainder" — a law aimed at punishing an individual whose guilt has not been established in the courts.

THE LAW, and the court's decision, involved only the tapes and papers from Nixon's five and one-half years in office. But one of the court's dissenters, Justice William Rehnquist, said the Nixon case could affect all future presidents.

His contention was directly rebutted by Justice John Stevens.

Justice William Brennan Jr. wrote the majority opinion, joined by Stevens and Justices Potter Stewart and Thurgood Marshall.

Justices Harry Blackmun, Lewis Powell Jr. and Bryon White joined in most of Brennan's findings.

Rehnquist and Chief Justice Warren Burger dissented, saying Nixon, like every president before him, should be allowed to decide which portions of the presidential materials he generated to give to the government for public consumption.

During Nixon's three-year battle to control the materials, the tapes and documents have been stored at the White House and the National Records Center in Suitland, Md.

NIXON and other officials of the executive branch have been allowed access to them, but the General Services Administration (GSA) was made outside custodian of all materials by the 1974 act.

Former Special Prosecutor Leon Jaworski, contacted at his law office in Houston, expressed satisfaction with the ruling. He said he believes the materials are government property, but considers it appropriate that Nixon should have access to them in writing his memoirs.

B1 bomber wins House approval

WASHINGTON (AP) — The House voted a go-ahead Tuesday for production of the controversial B1 bomber as President Carter prepared to announce his decision later in the week on whether to approve production.

The vote was 243-178. Carter's announcement was expected Thursday.

House Appropriations Committee Chairman George Mahon, D-Tex., predicted Carter will decide to put the plane into production, partly as a bargaining chip in the U.S.-Soviet arms limitation talks.

The House rejected an amendment by Rep. Joseph Addabbo, D-N.Y., to chop all $1.4 billion production money for the B1 out of a $110.6 billion defense appropriation bill.

Speaker Thomas O'Neill, who has been critical of some defense programs in the past, stayed out of the debate but told newsmen he supported putting the B1 into production.

"We should go into the SALT strategic arms limitation talks with strength," O'Neill said.

HOUSE opponents contended the $24.8 billion program is for 240 B1 bombers that will be obsolete when they start flying in the late 1980s. But backers denied this and said the bomber is needed in addition to missiles to deter nuclear war.

Rep. Robert Dornan, R-Calif., said the Soviets should know that just one B1 bomber would have enough nuclear fire power to wipe out 48 Soviet cities if the Soviets launched a nuclear war.

"What we're trying to do is keep the Soviets off guard," Dornan said, "so they will not kill our women and children."

But Rep. Tom Downey, D-N.Y., said the Soviets will have the capability by the time the B1 substantially replaces B52 bombers to shoot the planes down before they can destroy anything.

"We're going to spend $22 billion on a weapon that by the 1990s is going to be obsolete and that is obscene," he said.

Checking accounts may draw interest

Carter supports banking legislation

By STEVE CARTER
Collegian Reporter

Through legislation backed by the Carter administration, people may soon be able to collect interest on their checking accounts.

Speaking before a Senate banking subcommittee, U.S. Treasury Secretary Michael Blumenthal said the proposed legislation "would be a clear benefit for all depositors, large and small." Later in his testimony, however, he admitted depositors who write a large number of checks and have a small bank balance would not benefit from the legislation due to the increased fees the banks would have to charge for offering this service.

Because of the increased cost, Blumenthal said he believed some consumers might continue with conventional checking accounts to avoid the increased checking charges.

Since 1933, commercial banks have not been able to pay interest on checking accounts. However, in the last few years, savings and loan institutions in six New England states have been experimenting with negotiable orders of withdrawal (NOW) accounts.

WITH THE FAVORABLE results of the NOW accounts, the Carter administration wants to permit commercial banks nationwide to offer interest-bearing checking accounts.

Member banks of the Federal Reserve System would receive interest payments on the deposits they are required to maintain with their central federal reserve bank to help offset the expenses of the NOW accounts. This compensatory measure is part of the proposed banking legislation.

Banks in Manhattan foresee no problems in changing over to interest-bearing checking accounts if the legislation is passed.

"The banking industry is historically adaptable. I think we can adapt," said Allen Bell, president of the Citizens State Bank and Trust Company.

"The rest of the country will have the benefit of looking at what happened to the East and benefit from their mistakes," Bell said.

"There will be very little problem because the technology is there to change to the NOW accounts," said James Mock, president of the Kansas State Bank.

BELL AND MOCK believe the legislation won't protect the average individual as it's intended to do.

"This is not consumer legislation. It will not help the small consumer. The legislation will help the wealthier individual because they will have the money to get paid interest on," Bell said.

"It is going to make more money for the people with the most money and unfortunately as a lot of the legislation goes, it does not protect the average individual that it's really intended to help," Mock said.

If the legislation passes, the general fee structure of other services the banks offer will have to be looked at and adjusted along with the checking account charges because the cost has to be borne by somebody, Mock said.

"You may find that people will be earning interest on their checking accounts, but at the same time paying for the checking service," Bell said.

"The general trend, if the legislation is passed, will be towards a more realistic pricing of the checking account service," Bell said.

MOCK, ALONG with the American Bankers Association, foresees a problem with the NOW accounts due to the inequality between commercial banks and the savings and loan institutions. Savings and loan institutions are allowed to pay one-fourth to one-half per cent more by law on their savings and certificates of deposits.

"If the savings and loan companies are allowed to use their savings accounts as checking accounts (with this proposed legislation) then they by law are allowed to pay a higher interest rate, so why would there be any advantage to come to a commercial bank," Mock said.

If the savings and loan companies and the commercial banks compete equally with this proposed legislation then Mock said he would be in favor of the NOW accounts.

Neither Bell or Mock said they believe the NOW accounts would be beneficial to K-State students, because most of them are on an economy type of checking account and would not benefit due to the increased checking fees the banks would have to charge.

Both said they believe the proposed legislation will pass, although maybe not in the next legislative session.

Doctor defines child abuse, neglect

Editors Note: This is the second in a two-part series on child abuse.

By DEBBIE BURKLAND
Collegian Reporter

Public concern for child abuse and neglect has resulted in an increase in demand for information.

There are several categories of abuse and neglect, Graham Rose, a local pediatrician said. The most familiar form is physical abuse. Physical abuse is defined as a non-accidental trauma inflicted by the caretaker.

"Excessive physical abuse is anything that leaves a bruise," Rose said.

He said there are many cases of nutritional neglect, the most common form of abuse, in Manhattan. Neglect of medical care for a specific disease is also a form of child abuse.

"Sexual abuse is the most under-reported and under-diagnosed form of abuse," Rose said, adding the problem with this type of abuse is the low number of people reporting cases. Venereal disease and other types of infections are frequently found in sexually abused children.

ANOTHER TYPE of abuse is emotional abuse, where the child is often abandoned by the caretaker. Emotional abuse is difficult to prove, according to Rose, and very few cases ever come to court.

Parents of abused or neglected children come from all backgrounds. Most of them are from lower socioeconomic groups.

Rose said these parents may suffer more frustrations than parents of higher income levels, which may account for the greater amount of child abuse. He said many parents in higher socioeconomic levels also abuse their children, but the cases are rarely reported. Women tend to abuse children more than men, mainly because they are the primary caretakers of children, he said.

"If men are the abusers, the abuse is usually a lot stronger in a physical nature," he said.

Rose said premature infants run three times the risk of being abused than other children. He said step-children also suffer a higher chance of abuse.

WHEN A BATTERED child comes in to a physician, the first step the physician should take is to hospitalize the child, Rose said.

"Then you are fairly safe that you can do a thorough examination of the child," he said.

The hospitalization period also allows time for the Social and Rehabilitation Services (SRS) to come into the case and take appropriate action.

When SRS receives a complaint concerning child abuse or neglect, the intake worker tries to get general information about the name of the family and child and what the abuse is.

The worker then goes out and investigates calls, at least initially, said Mike Brenn, intake worker for Manhattan SRS. The intake worker contacts the family to see if there is any validity to the complaint.

"If the complaint is serious and it looks like some work will need to be done with the family, I then refer it immediately to the protective service workers," Brenn said. The protective service worker then goes out and talks with the family and the abused children.

A social worker cannot take a child out of the home unless there is a court order. Brenn said protective services in this area also include preventive service. The SRS is normally contacted instead of the police, he said.

"People are becoming aware that the SRS agency is the place that you call," he said. "Some do call the police or health department, but these places know to refer the callers to SRS."

THE SRS and the court are the only two agencies authorized by the state to take calls, take down information and make the investigations. The police are usually brought into a case when a social worker has to have a court order before the parents of an abused or neglected child will let him enter their home.

"At that point, a lot of workers would probably take a law enforcement officer out there with them to back up the court order," Brenn said.

"If a child is severely abused or neglected, or is in the process of being abused, sometimes the worker will take out a law enforcement officer because, if the parents are in the middle of abuse, the officer can stay at the house and protect the child while the worker goes back and gets the necessary court documents to remove the child from the home," he said.

THE LAW GRANTS immunity to professionals and all those who call suspecting abuse or neglect. If the caller decides the case is severe enough, he may give up immunity by signing a dependency neglect petition, Brenn said.

If a court order is obtained and a child is taken out of the home he is temporarily placed in a foster care home. Within 48 hours after the child is removed from the home, there is a detention hearing to determine whether there is severe abuse.

"The signs of serious abuse or neglect are pretty obvious," Brenn said. When parents are interviewed separately, there is often a discrepancy between stories or the stories are implausible. Eighty per cent of the parents of abused children delay seeking medical attention, with half of them waiting one to four days, Rose said.

There are several organizations in Manhattan to help parents who abuse their children. Among them are the Family Coordinating Council, Parents Anonymous, Guidance Center, Extension Council and Parent-to-Parent, which is an attempt to link parents lacking in child care skills to parents and families who possess these skills.

UFM enrollment high for summer

University for Man (UFM) recorded 3,100 registrations for the summer session.

"This is the most we have ever had for summer," Lisa Barnes, UFM student coordinator, said. "People were most interested in classes where they could learn to use their own resources and talents." The class with the most people registering was Solar Houses and Energy Efficient Homes, with 68. Home Health and Fall Vegetable Gardening were other popular classes.

"I think summer enrollment in UFM will continue to increase because people are more interested in learning on their own and developing their own skills," Barnes said.

UFM has several goals including helping people teach themselves, offering classes the university doesn't and anticipating peoples' changing needs, she said.

WASHINGTON — House members, skittish about the $12,900 pay raise they voted themselves earlier this year, cancelled on Tuesday a cost-of-living raise amounting to about $3,500 for members of Congress and top federal officials.

The 397-to-20 vote was only the curtain raiser in a major struggle over whether to roll back the pay raise members have been receiving since March 1. The test on that issue begins Wednesday when the House takes up the legislative appropriations bill.

An amendment will be offered to that measure denying funds to continue the pay raise for senators, representatives, high executive officials such as cabinet members and the top brackets of the civil service. Those categories total more than 20,000 persons.

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. — A malfunction aboard the Space Shuttle during its second manned flight Tuesday forced postponement of a third test flight scheduled for Friday.

Space agency officials met Tuesday afternoon to determine what effect the leak in an auxiliary power unit (APU) would have on future missions. The APU is one of the devices that drive the control system of the airplane-like shuttle.

Two crewmen were aboard the craft, which rode fixed atop its jumbo jet carrier plane, practicing maneuvers that will be used to release it from the mother ship for free flights later this summer.

LONDON — Viscount Newport, who last year met inflation head-on by opening a posh caviar restaurant, has sold a quarter of a ton of the costly fish eggs in the first 12 months of his Caviar Bar.

Newport opened his place, actually a fish restaurant with caviar as its specialty, as Britain lurched toward a $20 billion deficit and staggered under runaway inflation. Many of his friends said he would lose on the venture.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Security police announced Tuesday three more black urban guerrillas, described as having been trained in Marxist Angola and carrying Communist-made arms, have been captured inside South Africa.

The men were arrested in the segregated black townships outside the capital of Pretoria, where police said they also seized caches of automatic firearms of Communist origin.

The arrests brought to eight the number of guerrillas announced captured since three black terrorists shot and killed two whites in downtown Johannesburg on June 13 in broad daylight.

Security police were reported late Tuesday still combing the country for at least two other members of a group of urban guerrillas said to have slipped into the country earlier this month.

WASHINGTON — The Carter administration's human rights campaign has had only a slightly negative effect on efforts to reach a nuclear weapons agreement with the Soviet Union, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance said Tuesday.

In any event, Vance said, "We will continue to pursue it; we are not going to walk away from this issue."

Vance said; "I still believe that the Soviets will make their decisions on the SALT talks on the basis of what they consider to be their national interest in terms of military and strategic purposes."

Asked to what extent the human rights campaign has clouded or inhibited progress, he replied tersely, "In my judgment, not much."

Building standards include insulation

TOPEKA (AP) — Kansas became the second state in the nation Tuesday to establish insulation standards for new residences and commercial buildings, an official of the state Corporation Commission said.

G.T. Van Bebber, Corporation Commission chairman, said all new residential buildings must also have storm doors and windows or other satisfactory window and door treatment, insulation must be sufficient to meet heat loss and transmission standards, and air conditioners must meet certain cooling efficiency standards established by the Commission.

Beginning Nov. 1 an owner must certify to the appropriate utilities that the new structures meet the standards set forth in the commission's order before they can receive permanent gas or electric service.

"It is essential to take positive action now, rather than waiting for the energy crisis to worsen," Van Bebber said.

Richard Snyder, an attorney for the Corporation Commission, said the only other state to have adopted similar standards is California.

Speed-reading program to be barred at K-State

By LISA SANDMEYER
Collegian Reporter

READS, a speed-reading program which, its creators say, will triple students' reading rates and improve study skills, has been barred from K-State.

The last READS (Reading Education and Direct Study) course was never completed and no one has received a refund, according to Brenda West, Consumer Relations Board (CRB) director.

The last two sessions of the six-week course held last spring were never held, West said. The class was a week late in starting and didn't meet again for three weeks.

The president of the company offering the course has offered to let those in the unfinished session retake the course in the fall at no charge or get a partial refund for the two classes never held, West said.

IN ORDER TO get a full refund, the student must prove he has not tripled his reading rate and that he has done his 30 minutes per day homework. It must also be the student's first speed-reading course.

The conditions of the contract offer a partial refund on the required $25 deposit but makes no provision for refunding the entire amount. The course description explains refunds to dissatisfied students will be made "based on relative progress."

"We can't take any action against READS until those people who were ever involved with the program get in touch with CRB and file a complaint," West said. "We (CRB) have no way of finding out who was enrolled in the course to get in touch with them."

CRB is forwarding all complaints to the Consumer Protection Division of the Kansas Attorney General's office which will then get in touch with READS.

READS has solicited its services in the K-State Union in past semesters, but will not be allowed back on campus, West said.

"The company's offer to let students retake the course is valueless if it won't be allowed on campus again," West said.

Vern Miller? not again!

Vern Miller... the name conjures up an image of a little man jumping from trunks of automobiles to apprehend marijuana smokers; a little man leaping aboard an Amtrak train traveling through Kansas to see if any liquor was being served on-board; a little man declaring that airplanes flying over Kansas at an altitude of 30,000 feet could not serve drinks while flying over the state; a little man, with the press always close behind him, making Kansas the laughing stock of the nation. All of these incidents occurred while Miller was Kansas Attorney General.

SINCE HE has become district attorney of Sedgwick County, Miller has again been in the state and national limelight. This time, he is noted for his zealous crack-down on pornography in Sedgwick County and his questionable stand on first amendment guarantees.

Miller's actions in Wichita have shown him to be an enthusiastic opponent of pornography. He has seized films in all the "porn" theaters in the city and has virtually ignored the owner's first amendment rights.

Now, word is out that Miller plans to run for governor again in 1978. He has already tried for the governor's seat but was, thankfully, defeated by Gov. Robert Bennett.

MILLER has virtually no qualifications for the governor's office. He is not known for his wise legislative ability or his practice as a lawyer, rather, he is known as the outlandish publicity-seeking little man who made Kansas the talk of the nation. And that talk was not beneficial to the image of the state.

In light of the revelations about Kansas' image in the nation, the last thing we need is Vern Miller as our governor.

State image could improve

Wichita Eagle columnist Bob Getz pointed something out Sunday which bears repeating. It's that Kansas, as a state, has done very little to attract tourists. Not only has it done little, it spends less than 48 of the states on bolstering its tourism trade.

Kansas' attitude toward outsiders transcends tourism. It has done little, compared to other states, to attract outside businesses.

Fortunately, Kansas hasn't prostituted itself by inviting polluting or otherwise unfavorable industries. Manhattan, for example, recruited Mc-Calls — a safe industry by most standards.

But in an effort to sterilize itself from the dangers of industrial growth, Kansas is overlooking potential income in the name of economic development.

KANSAS has assets which should be intelligently used to its benefit.

Most out-of-state students realize, as do many Kansans, that Kansas suffers from the Dorothy-Toto stereotype. It is looked upon by many outsiders as the conservative bastion of the Midwest, an almost reactionary state with only farms, small-town sheriffs and those ridiculous liquor laws.

Kansas has an unfortunate reputation which needs to be updated and revised to present the state as it really is.

That requires a high-budget public relations campaign. Most out-of-state students are surprised at Kansas. We are surprised that Kansas isn't the antiquated cornfield we expected.

For good or bad, Kansans revealed a surprising political awareness when they replaced the Republican political fixture with a Democratic statehouse. There are two rather progressive U.S. Congressmen from Kansas in Keys and Glickman.

BUT THIS is just one of several indicators that Kansans don't epitomize the American Gothic as everyone thinks.

Kansans already realize what Kansas has to offer.

What is needed is for Kansas legislators to loosen their fiscal belts a notch or two and let some money flow—advertising money.

With a little effort, money, imagination and foresight, Kansas can bring in the industry and tourism it has been denying itself over the past years.

Other states, not the traditional tourist states, have spent large amounts on promoting their states and it's paid off. There's no reason Kansas couldn't do the same.

With one of the most extensive state park systems in the country and bountiful hunting locations, vacationers would think twice about "trying to get through Kansas" on the way to other states.

And with a reasonably accommodating department of economic development, outside industries would consider Kansas a possible location for a new relocating plant.

If they only knew what Kansas had to offer.

Letters to the editor

Child abuse should not be ignored

Editor,

I am writing in response to the article in the June 28 Collegian about child abuse. Having recently reported a case of child abuse to the authorities, I felt I would like to relate my experiences to the readers.

I live in an apartment in Junction City which is inhabited almost exclusively by military personnel. The insulation in my apartment is not of the best quality and the sounds from the apartment below are extremely audible. It is because of this that on one quiet afternoon while I was trying to take a nap, I heard the woman below screaming and hitting her 6-month-old son.

Not wanting to appear the "busybody" I did not report the incident immediately. It was only after the incident was repeated on several separate occasions and I saw visible signs of abuse on the child that I made the decision to call the authorities.

MY FEELINGS about reporting my neighbor were ambivalent. On one hand I felt I was interfering in something that I had no right to interfere in. However, on the other hand I felt the child had a right to be protected from the cruel treatment he was receiving and there was always the frightening possibility that one time the mother would go too far and possibly kill or maim the child and I would be a silent witness who did nothing to prevent a tragedy which would become just another ugly statistic in the grizzly saga of the abused child.

Once reported to the authorities, the case was dealt with immediately and is still being followed up today. I don't know if this help will have any long-range effects for the mother or the child, but I do know the anguished cries from below have all but ceased.

One thing my experience has taught me is that one concerned neighbor can make a difference where child abuse is concerned, by not ignoring it when it appears right next door.

Abortion is an individual choice

Re: Kay Coles' editorial: "Abortion is an individual right"

Editor,

I would like to speak to the "abortion issue". One aspect of it is theological. But most minds are set in their beliefs here, e.g. I believe it is wrong.

However, we all participate in a pluralistic society, i.e. with people holding different beliefs. Tolerance for others' beliefs means I would not force them to live by mine. Let them abort their children for whatever they deem appropriate reasons. I ask only for reciprocal tolerance. Do not require me to participate in what I consider murder. As I objected to my tax money purchasing napalm for Vietnamese, I object to my tax money paying doctors to abort lives.

If we would help the poor with tax monies, let it be with goods we both consider essential, perhaps food, housing and access to education. If abortion is considered an essential right, I would object to the whole program.

New youth game played to the Tee

By DEBBIE BURKLAND
Collegian Reporter

There is a pitcher, a catcher and a batter, but they have little to do with each other.

The name of the game is "T" Ball and the idea is catching on for young children across the country.

"T" Ball began on a national level in the late 60s. It was organized in Manhattan in 1972 and is funded through the Manhattan Optimists club.

"The purpose of 'T' Ball is to introduce the kids to competition and teach them the fundamentals of baseball," said Gary Young, Optimists member and coach of a local "T" Ball team.

The ball is hit off an adjustable tee instead of being thrown by a pitcher. Bud Crabtree, Optimists member, said this is because the concept of "T" Ball centers around younger children.

"A pitcher will either dominate a team or ruin a team," he said.

Sports

He said this makes for very little activity in the game.

CRABTREE said a young child can often ruin his arm by pitching, which is another reason the ball is not pitched.

To play "T" Ball a child must have at least completed the first grade. The child can also play after he has completed the second grade.

The rules of "T" Ball are similar to baseball rules with some exceptions.

The game time limit of "T" Ball is 50 minutes. Any innings started but not completed prior to the time limit are not included in the official score. No team records are kept after the games.

Ten batters constitute a half inning of play and an out only keeps the runner from scoring. All 10 batters may score during this half inning. A base runner cannot lead off the base until the ball is hit.

Even though he doesn't pitch, there is a pitcher position in "T" Ball. Young said this is to make players realize there is a pitcher position in baseball and softball. Anytime the batter misses the ball or hits the tee under it, a strike is counted. The batter gets three swings to hit the ball.

THE FIELDING team consists of 10 players. This allows one player to be placed by a coach in a random position, such as rover short stop. No fielder may play closer to home plate than the pitcher's mound.

Each player plays a minimum of two innings per game in the local "T" Ball program. There is a limit of 15 members on each team, so up to five substitutions are made each inning.

The batting tee is placed two feet behind home plate. The catcher position is four feet behind the tee. The catcher stands about 45 degrees to the side facing the batter to prevent getting hit by the bat. This also allows him to move toward home plate without going around the tee.

Players are not rotated in batting positions each inning as in softball and baseball. The batting order is determined by the umpire before each inning to allow each player a chance to hit in different positions in different innings.

Cleats and aluminum bats are not allowed in "T" Ball. Runners, batters and the catcher must wear batting helmets.

"When the program began in Manhattan there were a little over 300 kids," Crabtree said. This year, around 450 children are playing "T" Ball in Manhattan.

Novice McEnroe advances to Wimbledon semi-final

WIMBLEDON, England (AP) — John McEnroe, 18 years and 4 months old, upset Phil Dent of Australia Tuesday and became the youngest men's semi-finalist in 100 years of Wimbledon.

The fair-haired left-hander from Douglaston, N.Y., who plays as an amateur among big-money professionals, won 6-4, 8-9, 4-6, 6-3, 6-4.

He set another record at the same time. He is the first man ever to make the semifinals of the world's greatest tennis tournament after playing through the qualifying competition.

"I wasn't sure if I would get into the tournament at all," McEnroe said. "And when I did get in, I didn't expect to win more than a few games in each set."

THE YOUNG hero of the century tournament now faces the No. 1 seed, Jimmy Connors of Belleville, Ill., who defeated Byron Bertram of South Africa 6-4, 3-6, 6-4, 6-2.

The other semifinal will be between Vitas Gerulaitis of Howard Beach, N.Y., and defending champion Bjorn Borg of Sweden.

Gerulaitis overran Billy Martin of Palos Verdes, Calif., 6-2, 8-9, 6-2, 6-2 while Borg played some of his finest tennis to win 6-0, 8-6, 6-3 over Ilie Nastase of Romania, the man he beat in last year's final.

McEnroe, an excitable youngster with a white headband around his long, blond hair, had many moments of frustration before overcoming the 13th-seeded Dent. He threw his racquet, shouted at a linesman and fell full length on the grass more than once, holding his head in his hands.

But he brought his emotions under control to win the last two sets — just when it looked as if Dent, nine years his senior, was taking control.

McEnroe's most prolific stroke was his backhand. He hit a magnificent backhand past the Australian to break service at 4-3 in the final set. It proved to be the shot that won the match. He kept his cool and held on to his service.

Rec services plans tourney

Some people miss basketball after only a few months absence. For them, K-State Recreational Services is planning a summer session intramural basketball tournament.

"We've had a few requests for such a tournament, so we thought we'd give it a try this summer," said Bill Harms, director of intramurals.

The tournament, to be July 6 to 15, will have several different rules than tournaments during the regular school term. Because of the lack of officials during the summer, all games will be played on the honor system. There will be no game clock and the defense is responsible for calling their own fouls.

The tournament is open to all faculty, staff and students. Entry forms are available in room 12 of the rec services office and are due by Friday. All games will be scheduled for the early evening hours and will be in the Ahearn gym.

Wives adjust to American lifestyle

By DIANE GONZOLAS
Collegian Reporter

Being the wife of a student can be difficult. Living thousands of miles away from home doesn't make it any easier.

Ruby Haque came to the United States from Bangladesh two years ago. Her husband, Ekramul, was already here and was able to help her get used to some of the changes.

Other adjustments, however, were more difficult to make. Haque speaks Bengali and, although she knew some English when she arrived, she couldn't speak it fluently.

"I had a problem in understanding pronunciation," she said. She gradually became used to the language from being exposed to it through friends and TV. Her English is now almost perfect.

HAQUE HAS a BS degree in economics and social welfare from a college in Dacca, the capital of Bangladesh. But she cannot work in the United States because of immigration laws.

"They (foreign student's wives) can work with permission from immigration," said Joan Parker, secretary in the foreign student office. But they need to have a certain type of visa which Parker said is "not easy to get."

The majority of male foreign students and their wives have visas which don't allow them to work, Parker said. However, immigration laws put no restrictions on the wives attending school.

"It's entirely up to K-State," Parker said. "They can be special students. If they want to be regular students, they must go through the same procedures as their husbands did." About 15 wives attended school last spring, she said.

"I felt bad when I saw old people alone. We think men should take care of their parents."

Haque said she likes the United States very much. After her husband finishes his doctorate in December they may remain and become citizens, but there are some things about the country she doesn't like.

"I felt bad when I saw old people alone," she said. "In our country after we marry we still live with our husband's parents. We think men should take care of their parents."

ANOTHER DIFFERENCE she had to get used to was the role of women in the United States. She said women are treated more equal to men here and they have more freedom than in Bangladesh. Having a career and working would be "badly looked at" in her country, she said.

Rabab Sherif noticed the same difference between the United States and her home country, Syria.

"People are more free here," she said. "People can do whatever they want and nobody will care as long as you are not hurting them or breaking the law."

Sherif said the change wasn't very difficult for her to adjust to. English was no problem. She taught English in Syria. She lived in the large city of Damascus and said Syria has almost everything the United States does. She said she has had a problem getting involved.

"I don't really feel like I'm living here," she said. "I used to be a teacher. Now I stay at home and I don't meet a lot of people. If I were going to school or working it would be different."

SHERIF HAS been in the United States for more than two years. Her husband, Yosef, is an industrial engineering major.

"The hardest thing for us is that our husbands are busy most of the time," she said. "At home he was just working and we did a lot together."

Both Haque and Sherif are members of World Friendship, an organization which helps foreign wives adjust to changes and problems.

World Friendship is designed to "help bridge the gap between the foreign country and the United States and to offer friendship to foreign wives," said Susie Shaw, president.

"We help them (foreign wives) with any problems they have," Shaw said. "A lot of them aren't used to doing their own cooking and cleaning. They are used to buying foods that aren't available here and they have to learn to use different things."

WORLD FRIENDSHIP helps the wives meet these new responsibilities by having special interest groups in such areas as cooking and sewing. It also arranges for speakers, tours, potluck dinners, parties, and carnivals.

The organization hopes to be able to use the new International Center when it is completed, but Shaw said problems might arise in finding enough room for nursery facilities. John Brettell, foreign students' advisor, agrees.

"I don't know what the possibilities might be until we get into the new center as far as space," Brettell said.

MONEY CAN also be a problem for a foreign couple, Shaw said.

"Many foreign students are funded by their governments," she said. "Money doesn't go as far here."

World Friendship has a storage and loan closet where foreign wives can borrow baby furniture, suitcases and other items which may be too expensive for them. Shaw said she has also helped some wives to earn extra money by babysitting.

Some foreign wives have no difficulties with English, in some countries it is taught in the schools and in others such as Nigeria it is the official language. But Shaw said English is still the biggest barrier for many foreign wives.

Bridges in Riley County in better shape than others.

By MIKE NOEL
Collegian Reporter

Every day cars, trucks and school buses in Kansas travel over old bridges which may be in danger of collapsing.

State and county officials say the rotting timber and rusting steel that holds up hundreds of old bridges on secondary roads in Kansas are in danger of collapsing. In Riley County, the situation doesn't seem to be as bad as in other Kansas counties, according to Dan Harden, county engineer.

"We're not as bad off as some counties, but we're not in what I call super shape either," Harden said.

Harden considers a bridge to be in bad shape if its load capacity is only about three or four tons. Out of the approximately 200 to 250 bridges in Riley County, Harden estimates only about six bridges to be in this condition.

RILEY COUNTY is in a better position to maintain their bridges than most other Kansas counties for a number of reasons. Because of Tuttle Creek Reservoir, which eliminated many bridges on the Blue River, and the amount of the county in Fort Riley, (and therefore under federal jurisdiction), the county has to maintain far fewer bridges. The 200 to 250 county bridges are about half the number in some counties in Kansas.

Riley County also has a special bridge fund created by a one mill levy which raises about $100,000 a year. According to Harden, the cost to build a new bridge is about $21 per square foot. With the added $30,000 to $40,000 for the approach on each side of the bridge, the special bridge fund can replace one bridge a year.

Federal funding is also available to Riley County to help in the maintenance of older bridges. The federal aid to Riley County which provides funds for secondary roads as well as bridges fluctuates yearly. The funds have been about $100,000 per year, according to Harden. The county will receive about $80,000 this year.

Answer to yesterday's puzzle.

Recent rains, flash floods could hurt wheat harvest

By DENNIS BOONE
Collegian Reporter

After nearly a full week of disastrous rains and flash floods, wheat farmers in central and eastern Kansas may have noticed their crops have stopped rippling in the wind.

Now the wheat comes and goes with the tides.

Local farming authorities believe similar amounts of rain for another week could prove disastrous for local farmers.

"Prices are already so low that many farmers aren't going to be making any money off of this crop, they'll just be breaking even," said Floyd Smith, director of the K-State Agriculture Experiment Station.

SMITH POINTED out lodging, slow harvesting, additional drying and combining problems as problems caused by the heavy rains.

Lodging occurs when wheat is sufficiently soaked with rain and the stalk can no longer support the grain kernels. As a result, the wheat lodges into the mud and when harvesting takes place, mud, dirt and weeds are picked up more readily with the grain.

Tom Roberts, president of the Kansas Wheat Improvement Association, explained the process by which excessive rain affects wheat:

"The highest potential for quality in wheat is at the exact point of being ripe," he said. "But when rain falls on ripe wheat, it causes the kernels to first expand, then contract as they dry. This continued swelling and shrinking causes the kernels to have a lower test weight."

"The test weight of wheat can best be described as, say, a bushel of ripe wheat weighing 60 pounds. But when rain falls on the wheat and leaves it expanded, that weight could be reduced to 58 pounds per bushel."

YOUNG EXPLAINED the situation of the wheat farmers in the central and eastern portions of the state as being one of extremes.

"The problem facing us in the early spring was a lack of rain," he said. "Without that early rain, there was no crop potential."

"Then came the rains. They gave us the picture for a potential record crop. At that time, five or six states were looking for record wheat harvests," he said.

"But after Texas and Oklahoma — and some parts of Kansas — had started harvesting at a record pace, the rains did not let up. And now, while it's in the fields, we can't get to it. And each time it rains on the ripe wheat, it lowers the value grade of potential for use in food production."

ROBERTS SAID his own estimation on May 1 of the crop this year was 396.1 million bushels in Kansas. He said he raised that estimation to 408 and even 414 million bushels on the first of this month. Now he believes the state may produce the original 396 million bushels, well over the record harvest of 385 million bushels.

"A lot of wheat is growing well out in the west," Roberts said. "They haven't had as much rain out there, but even if they didn't the cutback in production would not go below the low 300's (in millions of bushels)," he said.

"Most of the lowland areas are awfully, awfully wet," Smith said. "Some of them are flooded to a considerable degree and much of that land will not be harvested."

Because of large reservoirs of wheat surplus from the past two harvests, neither Roberts or Smith feel enough wheat could be lost from this crop to have any profound effect on currently low prices.

"With what we have in storage right now, we could go two years worth of food production and not run out," Roberts said.

Rising pet numbers create problems

Editors Note: This is the first of a two-part series on Manhattan's pet population problem.

By EDMUNDEJEKAM
Collegian Reporter

Pets can bring a lot of joy or a lot of pain.

Manhattan gets mostly pain out of its increasing pet population. City authorities, however, are putting their heads together to find a cure.

A 1976 Riley County Police census placed the population of dogs at 15,000. According to Dan Mackillop, city animal warden, even though this number has increased considerably recently, only 1,000 dogs currently are licensed in the county.

A city ordinance requires that all dogs be registered. An annual license fee is required for dogs older than six months except seeing eye dogs. Cats are exempt from the ordinance.

"The licensing and registration procedures are to ensure that the pets are properly vaccinated against disease and also to identify owners of strays," Mackillop said. "But many pet owners don't heed the rules."

"There are several sides to the pet problem in this community," said Glenda Heldenbrand, president of the Riley County Humane Society. "But the root of it all is the irresponsibility of some pet owners."

HELDENBRAND said these people don't abide by the leash laws which prohibit animals from running.

"I receive five to 10 calls a day of loose dogs knocking over people's garbage cans, digging up their gardens or molesting other animals on leashes," Mackillop said. "Sometimes they even attack people."

The problems caused by pets do not end with physical damage. Unhealthy strays can carry diseases, many of which are communicable to human beings, Heldenbrand said.

According to Jacob Mosier, head of the department of surgery and medicine at Dykstra Veterinary Hospital, roundworms pose a real hazard.

He said when an animal carrying the eggs of the worm defecates in places such as warm sandboxes, the eggs hatch into larvae. Children playing in such places could then accidentally pick up and ingest these larvae, which then migrate through tissues. The parasite could cause blindness or brain damage, he said.

BESIDES the improper control and care of animals, overpopulation is another aspect of the problem.

"People who do not have their animals neutered pretty soon find they have a dozen or so animals they do not want. Then they let them run loose and get run over by cars and so on," Mackillop said.

According to Heldenbrand, many people don't like to spay or castrate their pets.

"But neutering an animal carries several advantages. The neutered dog is healthier, eats less, does not fight too much and stays close to home," she said.

They also cost less to license — $2 as opposed to $5 for the uncastrated or unspayed.

The increase in the pet population caused Dykstra to stop picking up strays in the city.

"We started picking up animals as part of community service in the '40s. Ultimately it became too much for us to handle because the number of animals increased, so we told the city we could not continue the practice," Mosier said.

K-STATE students were also cited as increasing the problem of strays. Mackillop said many of the students leaving home bring along a dog for companionship or protection. When they leave, they abandon the animals.

"I know most of the dogs in town. I go up and down every street once a day and when I see a stray, I follow it and sooner or later it goes home. I try to find out the owner before I catch it," Mackillop said.

"We'd much rather write citations than pick up dogs. There is no room at the animal shelter," he said. One citation could cost a pet owner from one dollar to $25.

A city ordinance empowers police officers or animal wardens to pursue, capture or kill an "animal at large." But, according to Mackillop, all animals are taken alive.

Asked for his equipment, Mackillop brandished from his back pocket an eight foot clothes line knotted at several places with a noose at one end.

And his methods?

"I usually call them (the dogs). If they won't come, they probably belong to women, so I solicit women's help. If that fails, I chase them as a last resort," Mackillop said.

Under the city ordinance, unregistered dogs that are captured are taken to the city animal shelter, currently at Sunset Zoo.

SUCH DOGS are held for 72 hours in lieu of being redeemed by their owners or adopted. Everyday at 1 p.m., KMAN radio broadcasts "Pet Parade," a program designed to inform the public what dogs are at the shelter. Unclaimed and unadopted dogs are taken to Dykstra where they are euthanized on Tuesdays, Mackillop said.

Some of the dogs find other uses at Dykstra.

"We use them in teaching clinical techniques if they are the right size," Mosier said. However, they can not be used for research.

"They used to just euthanize them at the shelter and it seems such a waste," Heldenbrand said. "For years the Humane Society has hidden the fact of euthanasia, but today we are advertising it openly for the control of pet population."

According to Mosier, euthanizing dogs involves giving them intravenous injections of barbituates.

Supreme Court declares death penalty unconstitutional for rape convictions

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court banned use of the death penalty for the crime of rape Wednesday and indicated that capital punishment may be an invalid penalty for any crime but murder.

The court voted 7-2 to strike down the death penalty imposed on condemned Georgia rapist Ehrlich Anthony Coker. A majority of six justices ruled that rape may never be punished by death.

Although the decision affects only six of the 350 prisoners on death rows, it may have a profound impact on the history of capital punishment in the United States.

Had the court decided that states may impose the death penalty for crimes in which the life of the victim is not taken, its reasoning could have opened the door for future rulings that capital punishment is an appropriate penalty for such crimes as treason, espionage, hijacking, terrorism or kidnapping.

REACTION TO the rape ruling was mixed but some women's groups that have been crusading for rape crisis centers and a crackdown on rapists said that severe penalties have hampered attempts to convict rapists.

Eleanor Smeal, president of the National Organization for Women, said "rape is a serious and heinous crime and should be severely punished. But the fact is that judges and juries aren't convicting." With less severe penalties, she said, NOW hopes that more rapists will be convicted.

The American Civil Liberties Union, which opposes the death penalty under any circumstances, noted that 405 of the 455 people executed for rape have been black and said that "today's decision means that this previous example of racial prejudice may no longer flourish."

CHIEF JUSTICE Warren Burger, who along with Justice William Rehnquist voted that the death penalty is a valid punishment for rape, said in a dissenting opinion, "The clear implication of today's holding appears to be that the death penalty may be properly imposed only as to crimes resulting in death of the victim."

Burger said the decision "casts serious doubt" on whether the court would look favorably on death penalty laws for crimes "which, though dangerous, may not necessarily result in any immediate death; treason, airplane hijacking and kidnapping."

The court's majority opinion was written by Justice Byron White.

WHITE'S OPINION said, "Rape is without doubt deserving of serious punishment but in terms of moral depravity and of the injury to the person and to the public, it does not compare with murder, which does involve the unjustified taking of human life."

White said the death penalty for rape is "grossly out of proportion to the severity of the crime," and therefore imposes unconstitutional cruel and unusual punishment.

Thorough thrashing

With equipment more than two decades old, Curley Minton, a local farmer, and Bill Koppenheffer of 2212 Casement Rd. cut Minton's yearly wheat crop.

Minton said his 1955 combine does a much better job than the newer models.

Congress retains salary increases

WASHINGTON (AP) — Congressmen voted Wednesday to keep their $12,900 salary increase as well as raises for more than 20,000 other federal officials and employees.

Ending a controversy that has raged since the raises went into effect in March without a vote, the House defeated 241 to 181 a move to cut off funds for the pay raises, which brought congressional pay to $57,500 a year.

Another vote was possible, but seemed unlikely to change the outcome. There was no indication that the attempt to short-circuit the raises would be renewed in the Senate.

The House Democratic leadership, working to preserve the raise, had taken strategic steps to win votes against the repeal amendment.

The leadership linked the proposed repeal of the congressional pay raise with the raises for others involved, including the vice president, cabinet members and upper echelons of the civil service.

Thus, to repeal the congressional raise, members also had to repeal raises for the others. Some congressmen said they were unwilling to do so and some argued repeal would break faith with those who left lucrative private employment to join President Carter's administration.

Kansas Democrats Martha Keys and Dan Glickman voted for the amendment to stop the raises. Republicans Kieth Sebelius, Larry Winn and Joe Skubitz voted against the bill.

Film blends comedy, drama

"Mother, Jugs and Speed" is showing at 8:00 p.m. today in Union Little Theater. Admission price is $1.

By JIM CHALFANT
Collegian Reporter

"Mother, Jugs and Speed" combines comedy and drama in the same style as "MASH."

It doesn't mix the two as well as "MASH," but the film is entertaining nevertheless. In fact, the movie might have been better off had it stayed with comedy and not attempted both humor and tragedy.

As it is, "Mother, Jugs and Speed" is the story of the F & B Ambulance Company, a private rescue service in Los Angeles. The company is a corrupt, fly-by-night operation breaking all the rules they can think of in pursuit of more patients.

F & B ends up with some strange patients. As the company's owner states, "People in distress are going to jump into the first ambulance available."

In the first few minutes of the movie, they pick-up a female wrestler who was injured in the ring, two over-dose victims, and a woman so large the drivers can't lift her onto the stretcher. These scenes are made funny, but there's sadness in the humor.

THE HUMAN condition is not flattered in this movie, yet the drivers are almost totally detached from it. This is everyday life to them, and it no longer bothers them.

The star of the show is Bill Cosby, who can be funny in just about any situation. He plays Mother, F & B's best and most obnoxious driver. His ambulance is complete with a tape deck and a refrigerator full of beer. His antics will keep you laughing. Cosby, however, has the same sad air about him which the rest of the drivers have.

LARRY HAGMAN is interesting as the pathetic Murdoch. It seems Murdoch has been driving ambulances too long, because he is really strange. He doesn't fit in with the mood of the movie, though.

That characterizes much of "Mother, Jugs and Speed" — unsure. After some fine comedy during the first 20 minutes or so, the movie straddles the fence between good comedy and mildly entertaining drama. Combining the two only weakens them both, as the funny scenes are offset by the sad ones.

The comedy should be enough to keep you entertained, but it never goes much beyond that. "MASH" it isn't.

Biology receives grant for research

The Division of Biology has received a $20,540 grant from the National Science Foundation for an undergraduate research participation program.

"The primary purpose of the grant is to provide stipends of $900 to each student (in the program) and money for materials needed in their research," said John Zimmerman, professor of biology and program director. "We are trying to give students a chance to get some experience doing research to let them find out if that is what they want to do when they graduate."

Students were selected by a board of faculty members on the basis of previous course experience related to ecological research, letters of recommendation and a statement of their goals, Zimmerman said.

"Students had to have an interest in doing research as a field they might want to go into when they graduate," Zimmerman said. "We chose those who we thought would be successful at it."

Ten students were chosen out of 50 who applied for the program, he said. Of those 10, only two are from K-State and most will be seniors next fall. The other students come from Colorado, New York, Iowa, Ohio and Texas.

"Much of the research being done is related to the ecology of the Tall Grass Prairie," Zimmerman said. "A lot of the work is being done at the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area."

Rape trials rescheduled

The inability of a witness to appear at the trials of accused rapists Roy Shine, Lynwood, Calif., and Jerome Holiwell, Manhattan, has forced a rescheduling of both trials.

Shine, whose trial was to begin Aug. 2, will be tried Aug. 8.

Holiwell's trial has been moved from Aug. 3 to Aug. 9.

Shine and Holiwell both pled not guilty to charges of participating in a gang rape of a K-State co-ed in the athletic dorm on March 30.

Shine, a junior, was a defensive tackle for K-State. Holiwell, a freshman, is a running back.

SARASOTA, Fla. — A heavy-set man ripped from a Girl Scout camp early Wednesday when a man ripped through the back of a tent telephoned home late Wednesday night to say that she was all right.

She said she was about to be released from her 17-hour ordeal, authorities said.

"The father just got a telephone call from his daughter," said Sheriff Jim Hardcastle at 10:30 p.m. EDT. "She said she was in Bradenton."

Charlotte Grosse, a slightly built girl clad in a Mickey Mouse T-shirt and underclothes, was dragged out of the tent as her sister and another Scout screamed and ran for help.

Bradenton is about 30 miles north of the wooded campsite from which Charlotte Grosse was dragged screaming into the predawn darkness.

WASHINGTON — Ralph Nader is organizing a campaign to bring lobbying pressure on 78 legislators in an effort to get the House to approve stalled legislation creating a federal consumer agency.

The campaign by a new coalition of consumer groups, labor unions, farm organizations and businesses will urge consumers to mail nickels — along with letters — to the 78 legislators who are considered undecided on the bill, he said.

Opponents of the proposed agency argue that it would cost too much. However, Nader said the agency's first year-budget of $15 million would come to about a nickel for each American taxpayer.

"It will cost the average American only about 5 cents each to create a consumer voice within federal agencies," he said. "Let big business spend millions on massive lobbying and full-page ads. Consumers will spend nickels to make their power felt."

VIENNA, Austria — The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries announced Wednesday that nine of its 13 members agreed to abandon plans for a 5 per cent oil price hike July 1 in an effort to end a rift within the powerful oil cartel.

Of the other four members, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates (UAE) had rejected the increase all along while Libya and Iraq apparently were holding out for the boost.

The decision to abandon the July 1 increase has been rumored for weeks. American oil industry experts have such a move would mean only a slight savings at U.S. gas pumps. An increase of a dollar in the price of a barrel of crude translates into about 2½ cents at American pumps.

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Saudi Arabia is earning money much faster than it can figure out ways to spend it.

The desert kingdom is taking in $41.4 billion a year from its vast oil deposits, and the budget for the fiscal year starting June 1 calls for expenditures of $31.5 billion. But despite a host of ambitious projects, analysts are skeptical about Saudi Arabia's ability to spend all that money.

Finance Minister Sheik Mohammed Abal Kheil announced a budget surplus of nearly $10 billion this past year and voiced confidence the kingdom will make good its vast expenditure plans.

He said the budget is designed to combat inflation, a statement interpreted as reflecting his government's intention to subsidize domestic sales of imported commodities.

Unusual insects on display

By SUSAN BURDEN
Collegian Reporter

"Oh my, oh my," gasped a student as she stared at a gray stick delicately mounted on pins.

The stick was really an insect, a Walking Stick which measured over a foot in length and was part of the "Oh My" Collection of insects at K-State's insect museum. The museum is in Waters Hall behind a door marked ENTOMOLOGY: INSECT COLLECTION.

Gasping for air is a normal reaction after entering the room because it smells like insecticide. The insecticide is needed to protect the insects from live insects. The room doesn't look like a normal museum. It is full of dark lockers which house glass cases full of various insects.

Derrick Blocker, supervisor of the insect research museum, said this collection is predominately regional.

"The entomology staff uses this research museum for identification purposes," he said. "We do loan out various specimens to specialists, too."

THE RESEARCH museum started during the early history of the department.

"We have some insects that were collected before the turn of the century," Blocker said.

One of the purposes of the museum is to show people insects are "not all creepy, crawly and bad."

"Most insects are beneficial, they recycle organic matter," Blocker said. He estimated two to three million different species of insects exist.

People are beginning to realize the importance of insects," he said. "Insects are the most highly evolved invertebrates."

There is a tourist collection for museum visitors called the Oh My Collection.

"It's called the Oh My Collection because invariably people gasp 'Oh my' when they see the collection," Blocker said.

The Oh My Collection contains the exotic species of insects in the museum, including butterflies in all the colors of the rainbow, iridescent beetles in shiny shades of green and purple, moths with monster eyes for protection and walking sticks measuring over a foot in length.

It has rhinoceros beetles over four inches in length and a peanut bug. The peanut bug is a beetle which derives its name from its peanut-shaped head. There is also a collection of small insects with oddly shaped antennae.

The most fascinating insects in the collection were the beetles covered with rhinestones.

"The Mayan Indians put jewels on these large beetles and attached a small gold chain to them," Blocker said. "The chain is then pinned to a shirt and the beetle is free to roam around. It's a live brooch."

Don't be fuelish.

Israelis face new U.S. position

Israeli Prime Minister Menahem Begin is scheduled to visit the U.S. in three weeks. It looks as though he will face new horizons when he meets President Carter.

Carter has altered the U.S. position in the Middle East with heavier leanings toward the position of the Arabs.

Carter has called upon Israel to guarantee a homeland for the refugee Palestinians.

It is just and right that the Israelis have their country, but not by denying the Palestinians their rights. The Palestinians were unnecessarily and brutally driven from their land when the state of Israel was created in 1948.

It has been suggested that the West Bank and Gaza be set aside as a home for the Palestinians. The Israelis have voiced strong objections.

Why? The Israelis were given land taken from others to create their state. Why shouldn't the Palestinians have the same rights?

CARTER has also proceeded slowly in the sale of advanced weapons to the state of Israel and well he should. Despite pro-Jewish publicity, it can't be called "news," the Arabs are not the people responsible for hostile feelings. The Israelis have shown themselves to be as war-mongering as they claim the Arabs are. Advanced weapons in their hands could very well lead to another all-out war.

Carter has also suggested to the Israelis that they be more compromising when discussing the withdrawal of the state behind the 1967 borders. Most of the land captured in 1967 is not arable. If the Arabs would like part of the land returned in a compromise promoting peace, then why should they be denied land?

The Middle East is a tricky situation and the U.S. must tread carefully. On one hand we have good friends and allies in the democratic state of Israel, on the other, we have good friends and allies in the Arab states. Carter cannot allow one side to dominate the scene as Israel has for the last 30 years. The time has come for the U.S. to understand and listen to both sides.

Rhetoric still has meaning

"Equality for women NOW," "Biology is not destiny," "Women hold up half the sky," "A woman without a man is like a fish without a bicycle," "Adam was a rough draft," . . . so goes some of the promotional radical rhetoric of feminists. There's some substance in it, too.

And I know what you are going to say. Shut up, right? You're tired of hearing about the women's movement, be it radically Redstocking or on the conservative end of the spectrum. Many are bored stiff with the cries women can't live within the old female stereotype and the questionable myth men can't live with the new female stereotype. I can't live with a stereotype, period. I prefer physical entities.

I think women in the movement are probably just as bored with the old women's lib stereotype of a buxom female atop a marble pedestal, burning bra in one hand and a castrated male in the other.

CRITICS are saying now the women's movement no longer has credence and is invalidating itself further with old, repetitious rhetoric. If there is any truth to this criticism, then I should be safe in assuming everyone in this land of the free and equal are, at least in their basic and civil rights, equal. That must be true in order for women and other oppressed groups to quiet their ranks.

As a woman, I'm not asking to be six foot four and 180 pounds nor to grow hair on my chest and face or have a househusband. Equality isn't a superficial thing. It begins inside as a sensory perception of life patterns — knowing you don't have to be married by age 20, knowing you can pursue any career you desire, knowing you are judged as a person instead of on physical merits, knowing you can buy your own house and so on.

Oh, the sins of alcohol

There's something bitterly funny about Kansas liquor laws. It's not just all the little assinine laws about 3.2 beer, "clubs" and reactionary Chicken Littles like Rev. Richard Taylor screaming about alcoholism; it's the whole mess together that spells hypocrisy at its best.

A 747 jet is cruising above Kansas. The flight attendants can't serve liquor while over Kansas. Now, just stop and think this through. Dissect this law and try to determine its rationale. About 200 people who may never visit Kansas in their lifetimes are denied a glass of vodka and orange juice because there is a fear among a handful of people 30,000 feet below them that their drinking will certainly disseminate through the clouds and infect the state.

THE UNDERLYING fear behind all Kansas liquor laws is that of alcoholism. The laws have their support, obviously, among state legislators. The legislators are in turn "advised" and supported by Richard Taylor, champion of the dry forces.

Taylor, like Anita Bryant, sees himself as the lone protector of all that is good, the light beaconing righteousness throughout Kansas.

Give him a hatchet, send him back 100 years and introduce him to Carrie Nation, also of Kansas.

Dispell any myths about freedom of choice or freedom of individualism and let Super Dry take care of us.

Bull and poppycock. Kansas and its liquor laws are insulting, provincial, hypocritical and illogical.

IT TAKES 10 days to get written permission to enter a "club" to have a glass of wine. Apparently, it takes 10 days because wine has a higher alcohol content than 3.2 beer. Somehow, it all makes twisted sense.

Don't let anyone enter a "club" without waiting a while. They will use the 10 days to realize that if they become a "club member" they'll also become alcoholics, and won't join. And if they're still not convinced they shouldn't join, make it as complicated as possible to get a drink once they do join.

By golly, that's it. Use liquor pools, punch cards and setups as a deterrent to alcoholism!

And water down the beer so everyone will buy that much more and bolster beer profits.

And, by all means, don't let anyone drink while on a train in Kansas or over Kansas "air space".

If that doesn't keep everyone out of the gutter, nothing will.

BUT to be real sure the sinister "wets" don't try anything behind our backs, we'd better elect a spineless state legislature and attorney general.

The only thing the dries forgot was 3.3 million sets of earplugs so Kansans wouldn't hear the rest of the country laughing at the state and confirming their Kansan stereotypes.

It's 1977. If the issue in all this liquor business is morals, then Taylor and his band of vigilantes are barking up the wrong tree. I object to having someone looking out for me and my behavior.

Kansans aren't a bunch of mindless idiots (at least most aren't) and they should have the right to behave as they see fit. The sin won't stop flowing from the bottle just because there is a thinly-veiled attempt to stop it.

People striving to stay in shape

By EUGENE PERKINS
Collegian Reporter

The physical fitness boom has hit Manhattan.

All the symptoms are here. The most visible sign is the joggers. At any one time of the day, in all types of weather, health enthusiasts can be seen jogging down Manhattan sidewalks, and on campus, as many as 25 to 30 students, faculty and staff may be seen circling Memorial Stadium at the same time.

"There are two reasons why I jog," said 46-year-old Jerry Parsons, professor of adult and occupational education. "One is for physical reasons. It keeps my weight down and I know in the long run it will help prevent potential heart attacks. The second reason is I'm more alert mentally. I feel better about myself and I work harder."

"When I don't run, I get tired more than I should. I don't feel as well and I know if I go to run that will take care of it."

PARSONS said he doesn't enjoy running but he enjoys the benefits.

"I have to force myself to keep a regular routine," he said. "I try to run three miles every time I go out."

On the other hand, Nancy Richards, senior in elementary education, said she enjoys running.

"A lot of people ask me 'Why do you run? It's really a drag. Why don't you do some other type of sport that's more fun?'," Richards said. "I like to swim and play tennis, but I think running is more beneficial."

Manhattan also has its share of tennis enthusiasts.

RICHARD COX, assistant professor of health, physical education and recreation (HPER), said 85 to 90 students are taking tennis classes offered by the HPER department this summer.

There are 160 men and women ages 16 and up taking tennis lessons sponsored by the Manhattan Recreation Commission this summer.

"The need for tennis instruction has doubled in Manhattan in the last couple of years," said Jim Colley, sports director of the Manhattan recreation commission. "Last year was the first year we offered beginning lessons in the spring and fall in addition to the summer lessons."

"We could offer intermediate and advanced classes, but the beginning classes take all the court time," Colley said. "We're just trying to get people interested in playing tennis."

RAQUETBALL is gradually replacing tennis as the nation's fastest growing participation sport, according to Newsweek magazine.

David Laurie, assistant professor of health, physical education and recreation, attributes the rapid growth of racquetball to the fact it generally requires less skill than tennis.

"People don't like to do something unless they experience success," Laurie said. "The beginning racquetball player can experience some success from the very start, but the beginning tennis player may have to play several times before experiencing much success."

Sports

Another form of exercise that has become very popular in its few years of existence is aerobic dance. Aerobic dance consists of exercise and dance performed with music.

"The dance steps we've used include the cha-cha, polka, waltz and the bump," said Valerie Peterson who is teaching the aerobic dance class offered by Recreational Services this summer. "Some of the exercises used in the routines are jogging, jumping and skipping."

"MEN CAN participate," Peterson said, "but they're overwhelmed by the number of women."

"I have a job where I'm sitting at a desk all day and the aerobic dance class gives me a chance to get some exercise," said Louis Daylor, 48, who works in the housing office.

"It's also good for the cardiovascular system," Daylor said.

"There is a history of heart disease on both sides of my family and hopefully participating in aerobic dance will help prevent it from happening to me."

The physical fitness boom is not only good for those who are becoming physically fit, but also for the stores which supply athletic equipment.

"Tennis racket sales have increased 20 per cent every year for the last two years," said Greg Gourley, manager of the sporting goods department at K-Mart. "More and more middle-aged people are coming in and buying tennis rackets."

"Racquetball equipment is our biggest selling area right now. We're carrying mostly low-line stuff now, but we're going into more expensive equipment very soon."

GOURLEY said exercise equipment sales — barbells, jump ropes, etc. — were better than ever and K-Mart is coming out with a new exercise line in the fall, due to a nation-wide increase in sales.

Ross Ballard, owner of Ballard's Sporting Goods in Aggieville, also noted an increase in exercise equipment sales.

"We can't keep enough jump ropes in stock," Ballard said.

"We sell a lot of exercise equipment in the spring when people decide they have to get in shape for the summer and in the fall when they have to go inside," he said.

Americans are known for overdoing it and Laurie commented many people who decide they should get physically fit try to do too much too fast.

"You can't get in shape overnight," Laurie said. "Any exercise a person does has to be progressive, that is, it has to be built up gradually."

"Most people that have soreness with jogging are in the 'fair-weather group,'" he said. "They do everything they can while the weather is nice. They go out and jog 10 miles and then they can't figure out why they're sore the next day."

Wade upsets Chris Evert; moves to Wimbledon finals

WIMBLEDON England (AP) — Virginia Wade, the English vicar's daughter, stunned reigning champion Chris Evert 6-2, 4-6, 6-1 Wednesday and reached the women's singles finals of the Wimbledon Tennis Championships after 14 years of trying.

Wade, 31, will play for the title Friday against Betty Stove, 32, of the Netherlands with Queen Elizabeth II scheduled to be among the spectators.

The tall, hard-hitting Dutch player defeated Sue Barker of Britain 6-4, 2-6, 6-4.

Evert, a heavy favorite to retain her crown, was hustled out of her stride and fell below her usual form.

"I could not reach deep inside of me and pull out what I needed to win the match," Evert said.

THE MEN take the center court again Thursday for their semifinals. Teen-aged John McEnroe, unheralded and unseeded, meets No. 1 seed Jimmy Connors and Vitas Gerulaitis plays defending champion Bjorn Borg.

The 15,000 spectators around the center court on Wednesday roared for Wade and saw a new player. The jittery woman who has been blowing her Wimbledon chances year after year was composed, confident and consistent.

"I have never played so well," she said — and gave some of the credit to playing for the New York Apples of the World Team Tennis league.

Wade won the first four games. And Evert never got her game going in the opening set. In the second, however, she scored with some great back-hands. When she leveled the match at one-set all, it appeared that it would be an Evert victory.

In the final set, though, the English woman took command again.

The athletes from K-State making the trip are Diane Moeller, sophomore in physical education; Carla Nealy, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education; Cathy Nealy, sophomore in physical education; Jan Smith, freshman in general; Renee Urish, junior in physical education; Joyce Urish, sophomore in physical education; Alice Wheat, sophomore in physical education; Cynthia Cynthia Wickstrom, freshman in physical education; Cindy Worcester, freshman in general, and Janet Reusser, senior in physical education.

The team will be coached by Iowa State women's track coach Chris Murray.

K-State women track stars to compete in European meets

A Big Eight women's track team will be competing for a month this summer in Europe.

Barry Anderson, head women's track coach, said the team, consisting of girls from K-State, Iowa State and Missouri, will compete in eight meets from mid-July to mid-August.

According to Anderson, the team will compete against some highly talented athletes.

"The best thing about the whole trip is it will allow the girls to see how the people over there live," Anderson said. The team will compete in meets in England, Scotland, Belgium, Germany and Switzerland.

Reactions vary on fireworks issue

Editors Note: This is the first in a two-part series on fireworks.

By NANCY DENNING
Collegian Reporter

The Fourth of July is a time for fun, relaxation and the unsolved controversy of fireworks.

Reactions vary over whether fireworks should be outlawed.

According to the man-in-the street: "Yes, the explosive ones."

"No, what would the Fourth of July be without them?"

"Yes, they are a waste of money and dangerous."

"No, the kids would miss something without fireworks."

The biggest Fourth of July celebration the U.S. had ever seen was in 1976. All over the world fireworks exploded saluting America's 200th birthday.

In Kansas this celebration resulted in 217 injuries, 109 more injuries than in 1975 according to Russell Collins, chief deputy of the state fire marshalls office. Twenty-one of these persons required hospitalization.

OVER HALF of those injured were under 18-years-old.

"Specific fireworks responsible for these injuries were firecrackers, 83; bottle rockets, 42; roman candles, 11; and miscellaneous, 37," Collins said. "This does not add up to 217 because the hospitals do not always list the type of firework which caused the accident."

Mosquito fogging locations announced

Summer is in full force now with people going to baseball games, taking their evening walks, and sitting in the old porch chairs. Yet, some people, particularly children, forget that summer brings mosquitoes and the fogging methods to get rid of them.

The public is notified through KMAN's morning news broadcasts so they will know what areas will be sprayed, according to Connie Fenton, KMAN employee.

"We announce the areas only on the days the city is going to spray," Fenton said.

The chemical used by the city department is malathion. The chemical is diluted. The spray consists of one gallon of toxin to 50 gallons of diesel fuel.

"The chemical itself is not toxic to humans in the amount we use," said Frank Johnson, city department employee.

"When we do go through an area we still ask the residents to go into the house and remain there until the fog has lifted," Johnson said. "It only takes a minute or two for the fog to clear."

Is it time for tougher control of fireworks?

In a random telephone survey of 100 Manhattan residents 45 per money, disturbance and injuries. THE AVERAGE age Manhattanites would allow their children to fire fireworks without adult supervision was 13 years.

"Firecrackers are a toy that parents hand their children once a year. There is no quality control, fireworks can go off without doing anything."

cent said "no," 40 per cent said "yes" and 15 per cent expressed "no opinion."

Those expressing "no" gave their chief reasons as tradition and not having anything to do on the Fourth. It would be a shame to have kids grow up without fireworks and fireworks are good entertainment, they said.

Those expressing "yes" to outlawing fireworks gave their reasons as danger, waste of

The average amount of money spent on fireworks in 1976 was $11.71 per family.

The general consensus was a need for a compromise pertaining to fireworks.

Even those Manhattanites most adamant against fireworks were generally in favor of public fireworks displays. Their chief concerns were children firing fireworks without adult supervision and the selling of fireworks to young children.

"There will be a public firework display at Bishop Stadium sponsored by the Jaycees," said Larry Ossenkop, president of the Jaycees.

"We (Jaycees) take every precaution necessary," Ossenkop said. "The local police help direct traffic, the fire department has trucks present in case of fire and firing is done towards the north into empty lots."

"The three people firing the fireworks are certified," Ossenkop said. In order to be certified they must work on a 'pit crew' for three years with a firework company.

"We buy our fireworks from two separate companies," Ossenkop said. "They deal with national, local and state laws so this relieves the Jaycees from worrying about the regulations."

THE JAYCEES have spent approximately $2500 on the firework display for this year.

"There is an admission charge," Ossenkop said.

"Families pay $5, adults $2 and children requiring a seat $1."

"We don't make any profit and just barely break even," Ossenkop said.

Many Manhattanites surveyed were in favor of banning the more explosive fireworks, such as bottle rockets, while still allowing the sale of firecrackers and sparklers.

"Firecrackers are a toy that parents hand their children once a year," one citizen said.

"There is no quality control, fireworks can go off without doing anything," another citizen said.

The controversy goes further than just the concerned citizen.

"The danger attendant to the use of fireworks is a constant worry to me both as a parent and as a legislator," said Donn Everett, state senator. "The difficulty with this is that such a bill seldom gets out of committee, let alone passes either house."

"My view and vote, would be to ban their use," Everett said.

It's still true.

Suits filed against Beech Aircraft

WICHITA (AP) — Civil suits totaling $4.25 million will be filed here Thursday against Beech Aircraft Corp. and two other companies as the result of a 1975 airplane crash in France, an attorney for the complainants said Wednesday.

The two new suits, to be filed in U.S. District Court, will bring the total amount of damages sought in the crash to $15 million. Six other suits were filed last week.

Named with Beech in those suits, filed by the widows and families of eight French nationals aboard the plane, were United Technologies Corp. of Hartford, Conn., and Pratt and Whitney Aircraft Group, a division of United Technologies.

Higher education laws in constant flux

By MIKE NOEL
Collegian Reporter

Law is a non-static and changing phenomena and trying to keep up with it is rough, said William Sparkman, assistant professor of administration and foundations.

Sparkman spoke on this topic Tuesday night in a speech titled "Higher Education and the Law." The speech was primarily for school officials concerned with changing laws in the area of higher education.

Sparkman noted the best way for administrators to keep up with the ever changing laws and their application toward institutions of higher learning is to keep in touch with publications on court rulings.

Sparkman cited a few publications that would help administrators keep informed of the law. "Law Week," a weekly publication, prints a synopsis of all Supreme Court rulings from the previous week.

"College Law Digest" is another source and is designed primarily for university attorneys.

"Case law books and textbooks are useful, but go out of date quickly," Sparkman said.

These books give good coverage on the background and basis of the law, Sparkman said.

HISTORICALLY the university has been viewed as an institution that takes the place of the parent, Sparkman said.

"It was a situation where the parent would hand the student over and say 'Here, do with him as we would if he were still living with us.'

"This view was not cognizant of the real world. This notion is gradually being broken down and on the way out," Sparkman said.

This view, popular as little as ten years ago, was illustrated by dormitory curfews, dress codes and many other restrictive rules imposed on students by the universities.

"I think now the basic relationship (between students and the university) is a constitutional relationship," Sparkman said, "where the university says to the student, 'We view you as a citizen' "

SPARKMAN says this newer constitutional relationship is replacing the older paternal relationship between the university and the student.

Sparkman also discussed key areas administrators should be familiar with in terms of the law and higher education.

The issue of freedom of expression and the rights of a university newspaper are important, Sparkman said. From the decisions passed down on these issues, guidelines have been set up for all public schools. Among the areas covered in these guidelines are the student's right to have notice of suspension and dress codes.

Federally funded abortions expand

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate voted Wednesday to broaden the conditions in which the federal government will pay for abortions for poor women.

Besides cases where a woman's life would be endangered by a full-term pregnancy, the Senate said federally funded abortions should be allowed in cases of rape or incest or where a fetus is likely to suffer deformity or debility because of disease.

The new conditions were written into a $60.7 billion appropriations bill for the departments of Labor and Health, Education and Welfare. They also permit abortions in cases of kidney disease, multiple sclerosis and ectopic pregnancy, which occurs outside the uterus.

The 56-42 vote rejected an amendment offered by Rep. Bob R

The 56-42 vote rejected an amendment offered by Rep. Bob Packwood, R-Ore., to delete any limits on the use of federal funds for abortion.

THE VOTE places the Senate in conflict with the House over the abortion question for the second straight year. The House voted earlier this month to bar federally funded abortions under any conditions.

The vote came on the same day that the Supreme Court returned to a lower court case challenging a restriction on abortion funding that Congress approved in 1976.

This restriction, known as the Hyde amendment, said abortions under such federal programs as Medicaid should be paid for only when a woman's life would be in jeopardy because of a full-term pregnancy.

A New York federal court judge stayed the restriction, saying it was an unconstitutional infringement on the rights of poor women.

Speaker discusses encounter groups

By BARBARA RUST
Collegian Reporter

Developing intimacy and trust with others is the essence of Carl Rogers' philosophy, said Layne Longfellow, director of industry, government and business executive seminars at the Menninger Foundation in Topeka.

"It is still hard to get to know people," he said. "It is still hard to move from superficiality to intimacy."

Carl Rogers, psychologist, firmly believes in ideals of change and social growth, Longfellow said. He thinks radical social and political change comes through personal change.

"If you can help people trust themselves and know themselves better, then the world changes," Longfellow said during "An Evening With Carl Rogers," a University for Man class.

Rogers doesn't think individual psychotherapy is the best use of the therapist's time. Because people live in a social environment, Rogers believes the therapist could help the individual function better with society.

"The therapist should first be a person to his client," Longfellow said. "Second, he should not call himself a therapist. The person (client) is lacking practice at interacting with society. The therapist should provide the opportunity for the client to practice."

TO HELP people practice, Rogers started encounter groups. Rogers said encounter groups are the most important invention of the 20th century.

"The therapeutic outcome of encounter groups is to discover that by being with people over time, you find you can trust them," said Longfellow, a former student colleague of Rogers.

Encounter groups consist of several stages, including getting to know each other, expressing feelings, accepting yourself and reaching intimacy.

According to Longfellow, several risks could result from an encounter group. Behavior changes in the groups diminish with time and people may leave the group with unresolved problems. Change may occur in the person, but not in his friends, making the transition from group to society difficult. Experienced group members might put pressure on new members to move faster.

"Psychology is not an either-or term," Longfellow said. "Each approach has its place. Each approach is useful for certain situations. Any therapist or counselor should know what is best for each situation."

Carter halts B1 bomber production

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Carter ordered the B1 bomber program halted Thursday, but said the United States should begin deploying cruise missiles that can be launched from the air.

In a surprise decision announced at a new conference, Carter said an "effective and flexible strategic force" could be maintained without the B1, which would have been the most expensive combat airplane ever.

Carter said his decision to kill the B1 was based on his faith in the cruise missile, his belief that the B52 bomber would continue to play a role and concern about the expense of the B1.

The President's decision set the stage for a fight in Congress over the B1's future. The House voted 243 to 178 earlier this week to spend $1.5 billion to build five B1's. The issue now goes to the Senate where the Democratic leadership supports Carter on the B1.

CARTER said he thought the House and Senate now would go along with his verdict.

After making his announcement, Carter told a congressman that he wishes he had made his decision before the House vote.

"I do think many of the people who did vote for the B1 did it with the thought that I would support it," the President said, referring to recent speculation that he would go along with at least limited production of the bomber.

Carter's decision to emphasize the cruise missile elevates the missile to a key position in the U.S. strategic deterrent along with the aging B52s, and land and sea-based intercontinental ballistic missiles now operational. The cruise is a slow-flying missile that can be launched from the air, ground or sea and can carry a nuclearwarhead.

THE PENTAGON is testing various kinds of cruise missiles and is planning to have some missiles combat ready by 1980. Pentagon sources said the program now will be accelerated.

Carter's decision limits to four the nation's fleet of the swept-wing, four-jet supersonic B1s, which would have replaced the 20-year-old B52s. Three experimental B1s have been built and a fourth now in production will be completed by the manufacturer, Rockwell International.

The project has cost the government $3.9 billion in money spent or legally committed to be spent.

The Air Force estimates each of the 244 B1s it wanted to build would cost $101.7 million and the cost of the total project would reach nearly $25 billion.

By halting the project, Carter held to a campaign position he made a year ago when he said the B1 was a waste and should not be built.

WHITE HOUSE Press Secretary Jody Powell said that at the heart of the decision, apparently made between Monday morning and Tuesday afternoon, was a search for a maximum deterrent for the dollars spent.

Powell said the B1 would not provide this, either alone or coupled with the cruise missile.

Powell, asked if the decision to complete the fourth model left Carter room to continue the project, said, "There is no doubt about the intent of the decision. He doesn't intend to build or deploy the B1."

If the Senate drops the B1 money and the House keeps it in the appropriations bills, the issue would be decided in a conference committee.

If Congress voted to appropriate the money for the B1, Carter could veto the defense appropriations bill or seek congressional approval not to spend the money.

It's doubtful Congress could muster the two-thirds majorities in the House and Senate to override a presidential veto. That would leave Congress with little choice but to delete the B1 funds.

The President's decision surprised many opponents of the B1, who thought Carter was leaning toward going ahead with production of at least a limited number of planes.

Fireworks spark concern

Editors Note: This is the second of a two-part series on fireworks in Riley County.

By NANCY DENNING
Collegian Reporter

The sale of fireworks in Riley County has sparked some concern among area officials that July 4 festivities may result in personal injuries and property damage.

"I do believe that there should be some restriction on the sale of certain types of fireworks, such as types of cherry bombs, torpedoes and the larger type of fireworks," John Stites, state representative, said. "By larger type fireworks, I mean the two and three-inch firecrackers that were available at the time I was a child."

"I strongly believe that we should allow the sale of other types of fireworks such as bottlerockets, regular size fireworks and nightworks," Stites said.

ACCORDING to Stites his reasoning is based on his childhood experiences and the fact that he took great delight as a boy shooting fireworks.

"I have a strong, happy remembrance of those days," he said. "I believe that the younger generation should also experience the fun and thrill of shooting fireworks."

"There have been so many restrictions put on the younger generation that they do not seem to have the fun we had in yesterdays."

Wheat harvest concerns farm official

By DENNIS BOONE
Collegian Reporter

Motorists passing through Kansas in the early summer may marvel at the vast expanses of wheat in the fields and the cattle bound for stockyards around the Midwest.

According to John Junior Armstrong, president of the Manhattan-based Kansas Farm Bureau, the farmers tending to the cattle and wheat have their backs against a financial wall that will collapse if something isn't done soon.

"The whole situation (wheat and cattle production) is a very complex deal," Armstrong said. "Especially the wheat situation."

Thanks to the recent break from the mid-June rains, farmers have been able to recover much of what was feared to be a highly-damaged wheat crop, Armstrong said. With the potential still remaining for a harvest of between 340-380 million bushels, the threat of a financially disastrous harvest hangs over the heads of those farmers.

"Nationwide, we have a surplus of one billion, 100 million bushels," Armstrong said.

"That's carryover as of the first of June. Right there is enough to last this country's needs for the next two years without storing any more."

WITH SUCH a massive surplus, Armstrong said, an additional 350 million bushels dumped onto the market would have a harmful effect upon the already low prices of wheat, approximately $2.25 today.

"I've been saying 400 million bushels as a predicted harvest," Armstrong said. "But there may be a loss of 15 per cent—60 million bushels—because of the rain. That leaves maybe 340 million they can get out now—a direct loss to the farmer in an already unfair situation."

Armstrong explained that, with wheat prices $1.50 a bushel lower this year than last, a $90 million loss would be realized with the reduction of 60 million bushels in production.

"That 15 per cent loss becomes very critical, and that's not taking in rising expenses and inflation the farmer faces," Armstrong said.

IN ORDER TO remedy the situation, Armstrong will recommend to Agriculture Secretary Robert Bergland a plan that would idle as much as 20 million acres during the 1978 production season.

"The answer to the problem is two fold," Armstrong said. "First, we have to shrink the plant. We're over-producing and there's too much for demand."

Secondly, we have to expand our exporting markets.

"What we would have to consider is a reduction of 500 million bushels nationwide," he said.

"With 63 million acres now under cultivation, that would mean idling 20 million acres. Now, I realize that that figure is pie-in-the-sky and there's no way the government will cut back production by a third, but if our exporting market remains the same, that's what it will take."

"And the only foreseeable market addition would be Red China. That isn't likely."

ARMSTRONG SAID while Bergland isn't in favor of providing financial reciprocation to farmers for idling acreage, some incentive will be needed.

"I would rather see tax money—if that's what it takes to save the farmers—go directly to incentives other than government loans to the farmers. This way, the taxpayers get the bargain."

With the current market price at times falling below the $2.25 average, farmers are snapping up government loans on the wheat. By paying the storage costs on the mortgaged wheat, farmers may be in a position in a year to sell that wheat at a higher price. If not they can opt to not pay the government back, and would in effect be selling the wheat to the government and picking up only storage costs.

But, says Armstrong, at that point the government is stuck with building additional storage bins, holding wheat it can't get rid of, which does nothing to help the market price.

THE GOVERNMENT can dispose of some of the wheat through the PL480 program, which either sells the wheat to countries in need of emergency donations because of disasters, sending the wheat in the form of outright gifts; or sells at whatever cost the government can get—to developing nations on a long-term loan basis.

"I wouldn't call it a catastrophe. Not yet," Armstrong said. "But it is a very serious situation. Livestock as well. I can't remember a time when livestock was down so long. Both livestock and wheat are selling at below the cost of production. That puts the agricultural economy of the state way down.

ARMSTRONG SAID an alternative available to the struggling farmer is the production of sunflowers. He said the state flower grows well in the climate, where there is often a lack of moisture.

"It's new, but the potential for sunflower production looks great," Armstrong said. "It has a high oil content and is high in polyunsaturates. It's not the answer to the problem, but it is an alternative."

Others have found it worth their while to put up the wheat as hay, instead of on the grain market, and they have been getting $25 a ton. This is the first time I can remember wheat being cheaper than corn," he said.

SARASOTA, Fla. — The FBI entered the strange case of Charlotte Grosse on Thursday — trying to locate the teen-ager who was abducted from a Girl Scout camp and then allowed to call home to say she was about to be freed.

"Where she is and how she is we don't know," said Sarasota County Sheriff's Deputy Ray Philon. "We fully anticipate we'll hear from her again."

Charlotte, 15, was dragged screaming from a state park at dawn Wednesday by a tall, dark-clad man who ripped open the back of the tent she shared with two Girl Scouts.

LONDON — The divinity of Jesus Christ is being challenged by a panel of British Protestant theologians who say Jesus should be regarded as a great teacher, not a super-natural miracle-worker.

In a new book entitled "The Myth of God Incarnate," the seven theologians argue Jesus was not God in human form but "a man approved by God" for a special role.

The authors say that Jesus did not claim to be divine but was promoted to divinity by early Christians, who still were under pagan influences. They say it will benefit the churches in an age of science if Jesus is regarded as a great teacher, because there are many who admire the wisdom of Jesus but cannot accept his supernatural aspects.

WIMBLEDON, England — Bjorn Borg of Sweden, beat Vitas Gerulaitis in a taxing battle of wits and patience Thursday and will defend his Wimbledon singles title against top-seeded Jimmy Connors.

Borg downed Gerulaitis 6-4, 3-6, 8-6 in a back-and-forth contest that wasn't decided until Borg broke the New Yorker's serve in the 14th game of the final set on the All-England Club's center court.

Earlier in the day, Connors, the 1974 champion from Belleville, Ill., ended the dreams of 18-year-old John McEnroe, the youngest semifinalist in Wimbledon's 100 years, 6-3, 6-3, 4-6, 6-4.

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y. — The Security Council unanimously adopted an African-initiated resolution Thursday urging aid for Mozambique in defending itself against border attacks by Rhodesia.

The resolution was approved following three days of debate and behind-the-scenes negotiations in which Western delegates won key concessions from African delegates.

Originally, the resolution called for "immediate and substantive practical assistance" to shore up Mozambique's defenses, but U.S. Ambassador Andrew Young and other Western diplomats felt this could be interpreted as an invitation to send foreign troops.

As finally passed, the resolution calls for "material assistance," which a U.S. diplomat said was agreed to mean "money, schoolbooks, tanks, anything but troops."

WASHINGTON — After more than a century of railway post offices, a period that included roaring gun battles with bandits, the postal service is ending the sorting of mail on trains.

Thursday's final runs in each direction between Washington and New York marked the end of a network that once included 1,500 routes.

"Replacement service will save approximately $1 million yearly without any decline in service standards between New York and Washington," Postal Service spokesman Lou Eberhardt said.

Of the final 68 railway postal clerks, 11 are retiring rather than work in a stationary post office.

Restrictions on former Nazi eased; Hess permitted to watch television

BERLIN (AP) — Rudolf Hess, the 83-year-old former Hitler deputy who is serving a life sentence, has been allowed to watch television on a regular basis for the first time, informed sources said Thursday.

Permission to watch a color TV set is part of a series of moves in recent weeks to make life easier for the onetime deputy Fuhrer, the only remaining prisoner in West Berlin's four-power Spandau prison.

Sources said he is now allowed two visits instead of one from his immediate family each month and more leeway in picking the time he may spend in the prison garden.

Hess, sentenced at the Nuernberg war crimes trial in 1946, never before had been allowed to watch TV while inside the brick prison. It was reliably understood Hess now has a color set available to him on call but that it is not in his cell.

"He got it about a month ago," a source said. "He enjoys it."

SOURCES SAID the same censorship regulation requiring the elimination of all mention of his case and the Nazi Third Reich from books and magazines is being applied to his television viewing.

Hess got his first glimpse of television in 1969 when he spent four months in a nearby British military prison. A picture later released showed him in a hospital bed, watching television and smiling.

Berlin had its first closed circuit telecasts in 1934, an innovation curtailed by World War II.

Before the easing of restrictions, Hess got one 30-minute visit a month from his wife or son. Now he has an additional half hour, although his wife and son still may not see him at the same time.

HESS NOW has some choice about when he takes his recreation periods. Previously, he had a fixed morning and afternoon schedule for walks in the garden where he feeds the birds, talks with his guards and where he has worn a rut into the path from walking thousands of miles.

In the middle of the war, Hess flew to Scotland in 1941 on a self-described peace mission. He was arrested by the British and held for a time in the Tower of London, the last well-known prisoner to be jailed there.

Woman allegedly kidnapped, raped

A 21-year-old K-State co-ed was allegedly abducted, driven to Tuttle Creek and raped early Wednesday morning as she left a local grocery store, according to Riley County Police.

Police said the woman was accosted at about 1:30 a.m. by a black man who was later joined by a white man.

Police said the three then drove to the Tuttle Creek swimming area where the woman was raped. The woman was later released in Manhattan.

The woman was uninjured and the incident is under investigation.

Dairy bar serves as produce outlet

When the hunger pangs hit or when a little refreshment is called for, the dairy sales counter in Call Hall offers relief.

The facility, also known as the dairy bar, is open Monday through Friday, 8:30 a.m. to 12:20 p.m. and 1:30 p.m. to 5:15 p.m.

The sales counter serves as an outlet for the products of research and class-work in poultry and dairy science. It is open to the public.

"All of the dairy products are produced and manufactured here (at K-State)," said Harold Roberts, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry. Ice cream, for example, is sold by the half-gallon or in a cone, sundae, milk shake or malt.

COTTAGE CHEESE, whole and two-per-cent milk, cheddar cheese, butter and eggs are also available. The bar also offers non-dairy products such as coffee, soft drinks and donuts.

Prices are comparable to those at area retail stores, Roberts said.

"What we try to do here is emphasize quality in our products," he said. A 12 per-cent ice cream mix is used.

The facility employs one full-time worker and is supplemented with student help.

"The majority of our customers are related to the university," Roberts said. The sales counter doesn't advertise but Roberts said long ago it operated a home delivery route.

In cases where there is excess milk now, he explained, milk is sold to a cheese factory in Alma.

During Christmas this winter, the dairy counter will offer a Christmas cheese package for sale. It will include edam, sharp and possibly swiss cheeses.

Bomber decision difficult, welcome

In announcing Thursday that he wouldn't authorize the construction of the controversial B1 bomber, President Carter proved that he has both political courage and plain, common sense.

Naturally, the announcement was met with Congressional ambivalence. There were surprised sighs of relief as well as forebodings of a U.S. military inferiority to Russia.

But Carter promised during the fall campaign that he wouldn't support the aviary white elephant and he made good on that promise. He admitted it was a tough decision to make, and it probably was.

IN REBUKING the military-industrial establishment, Carter proved to those of little faith that he will not be intimidated by the military or by congressional hawks and that he has a mind of his own.

Carter had to decide whether it was worth $1.4 billion to give the military only a temporary feeling of air superiority over the Russians. He decided it wasn't and it looks like he will now throw his support behind the more practical cruise missile.

To most, his decision came as a pleasant surprise. There was a fear last week that Carter was softening on his earlier stands against the bomber and that he might authorize at least a few to be built.

But by the time the fleet of B1s would have been completed, $22 billion would have been spent and they would be obsolete as they rolled off the assembly line.

MANY FELT the B1 should have been built if only to go into the SALT talks with a recognizable strength. Others, like Rep. Robert Dornan wanted the bomber built "so they (the Russians) will not kill our women and children."

Then, the argument goes, we can kill them more times than they can kill us. That's optimism for you.

What Carter and the more rational thinkers in Washington would rather believe is that if we cut down in arms buildup, the SALT talks might have a better chance of succeeding.

There's something wrong with building more weapons so that we can go into arms limitation talks with more confidence.

Carter is to be congratulated for his courage and foresight in snuffing out a bad idea before it turns into a deadly one.

Some tips for new students

The summer between high school graduation and the first semester of college is a transition period from teenager to adult for the incoming freshmen.

This growing up process can be hard in college because here no one regulates what you do or if you go to class. This is something you have to do for yourself.

For many students coming to college it will be their first experience away from home and might appear to be rather frightening but this feeling will be temporary. After the hustle and bustle of fall term begins you will be too busy to daydream about home.

WITH homesickness sounding like a major problem there are a few minor difficulties that might arise the first few weeks of school.

Getting up in time for the morning class after a full night in Aggieville might cause some problems. Since mother is no longer down the hall to scream at you when you refuse to get out of bed, buy a dependable alarm clock with such an annoying buzzer it will give you peace of mind to get up to shut the darn thing off and go to class.

To avoid asking an assumed upper-classman or other freshmen for directions, use the map of campus which was given to you at orientation. The map covers the entire campus and with a little sense of direction there should be no problems finding the buildings.

TRY to keep up with your homework assignments. K-State is on the semester system but that still doesn't give too much time to party and watch Mary Hartman when there are piles of assignments due for the next day.

Having fun is part of college life but don't let fun force you to find another school the subsequent semester.

If you follow these little tips, you should have no major problems in your new environment.

Letters to the editor

Terror unrecognized

Editor,

How could an uninformed bigot like yourself get on the staff of a responsible paper like the Collegian? And now that you're there, why don't you stick to local news or basket weaving? You don't have the tolerance or the information necessary to comment on the complex problems of distant lands.

The article, "Israelis face new U.S. position," fails to mention the long-standing terrorist campaign which has killed many innocent Israeli children and citizens. It fails to remember the Palestinian attempts to overthrow the legitimate and moderate Jordanian government by force. It fails to remark about the Palestinian involvements in the bloody civil war of Lebanon. Or to mention the tension between the moderate Arabs (e.g. Sadat, Saudis and Christians of Lebanon) and the Palestinians.

TO BE honest, the article presented none of the relevant facts for the Israelis' reluctance to an adjacent Palestinian state. It was merely a babbling of the anti-Semitic trash spread for centuries. If you read the "Hostages" by Svirsky, you will see yourself as one of the "executioners".

But most importantly, if you seek peace in the Middle East then think before you speak. Ask yourself what will happen when a sovereign Palestinian state acts as a base for terrorist activities against the Israelis? And ask yourself what will happen when the Israelis justifiably attack these terrorist bases? And ask yourself how the Jordanian government is going to control the Palestinians given their record of armed violence against established, moderate Arab governments? Sure the Palestinians need a state of their own. They will only be second-class citizens in any of the Arab states they now occupy. But does it need to be adjacent to Israel?

Students not at fault

Editor,

Those of us affiliated with Upward Bound, I'm sure have been quite aware of the statements people have made about the program. The program's purpose is to help talented youngsters from low income families get a post high school education. It seems like everything or anything that happens around the dormitories or other places on campus are blamed on us.

Being in the program for several years, I have heard many negative statements from people. Sometimes I felt as though I was being set up, or a scapegoat for people to blame, because people always need someone or thing to blame when things go wrong. I recently had a friend tell me as I was watching television about how he overheard a few people talking. The man said and I quote "Upward Bound students are here because they don't know how to read or write or do math."

NOW HOW do they know if we can read or write or do math problems? Now you and I know that in order to get through school, we have to know how to do some of these things. So this only shows us that they are the ones who need to go back to school.

This is my first year in college, and I have learned a lot. Not only have I already learned to read and write, but I have also learned that you can have all the education in the world and still be ignorant.

If I had one question I could ask these people, it would be "Who do you blame during the school year when Upward Bound is not here?"

Automakers must install safety devices

WASHINGTON (AP) — Transportation Secretary Brock Adams ruled Thursday that automakers must start equipping new cars with air bags or other passive safety devices in the 1982 model year.

By 1984, all new cars sold in the United States would be required to have the devices, Adams said.

The secretary also called on five automakers that previously had agreed to start equipping some 1980 model cars with air bags or similar devices to honor that pact — a request one auto industry official said was "an offer we can't refuse."

The order requiring passive restraints, which Adams said could save 9,000 lives a year, will go into effect automatically after 60 days unless Congress overrules it.

ADAMS told a news conference he was confident Capitol Hill would go along. But within an hour of the announcement, Rep. Bud Shuster, R-Pa., an outspoken opponent of air bags, introduced a resolution to overturn the decision.

Adams' announcement brought an outcry from some U.S. automakers, and their lobbyists readied a campaign to reverse it in Congress. Insurance officials, a motorists' organization and the head of the United Auto Workers Union, all hailed the decision.

The order would force the automakers to equip cars with air bags or passive seat belts that would not require human assistance to protect the front-seat occupants of an auto involved in a crash.

Air bags, balloon-like devices which expand when the car is in a crash, would be effective only in front-end collisions. Adams said seat belts like those used in today's cars still would be required as an air bag supplement.

Passive seat belts are a combination lap and shoulder harness attached to the car doors. They automatically wrap around the front seat passenger when the door is closed and lock into position if there is a collision.

Auto buyers would have their choice of systems. The secretary said 2.5 million cars would be equipped in the first and third years, and 5 million in the second year.

Meat-cutting research project proves chilling for professor

By MARY LOU PETER
Collegian Reporter

Michael Dikeman is doing some chilling research this summer. As he has for the past seven summers, Dikeman, a K-State associate professor of animal sciences and industry is working with the residence hall food stores in the Pittman building.

With the thermostat set at 45 degrees to guard against spoilage, he and his assistants are working on a meat cut-out research project.

"Our research is measuring the difference in retail yield, fat trim and bone of different breeds of cattle," he said.

The research is a cooperative project between the food stores system and the animal sciences department. The beef will be utilized in K-State's dormitory food system.

"We get our research data and they get some high-quality beef to supply the students," Dikeman said. "We're providing the students of K-State with really good beef — it's very young in age and has been on an excellent nutrition program," he added.

The cattle used in the project are produced and raised at the United States Meat Animal Research Center in Clay Center, Neb. The cattle are then bought and shipped in carcass form to K-State.

Dikeman and his crew cut the carcasses down to sub-primal cuts. Fat is trimmed to three-tenths of an inch on roasts and steaks. In ground beef the fat is kept at about 25 per cent.

At this stage, Pittman employees take over and cut the beef into retail cuts of serving size.

In addition to cut-out comparison, Dikeman is also doing sensory evaluations utilizing a taste panel and a Warner-Bratzler shear. The shear has a gauge which monitors tenderness in a piece of meat.

ARE YOU SURE YOU KNOW WHAT FAMILY PLANNING IS ALL ABOUT?

If you think it means preventing unwanted pregnancy... you're partly right. But it means more than that. Like counseling young people about how a baby before they are ready can affect their health or mess up their lives... helping couples who want to have children but can't... counseling men on male responsibility and methods of birth control.

It's important to know ALL about family planning... it means more than you may have thought.

Pet population troubles city officials

Editors Note: This is the second of a two-part series on Manhattan's pet population problem.

By EDMUND EJEKAM
Collegian Reporter

There is a growing concern among city officials over the problems posed by the increasing population of stray cats and dogs in Manhattan and Riley County.

Statistics at the Manhattan animal shelter show almost 1,500 dogs were brought to the shelter in 1976. 29 per cent of these were euthanized and the rest were either redeemed by their owners or adopted.

Dan Mackillop, city animal warden, said May is a peak period for strays. Figures for May this year show an increase from May 1976. There were nearly 145 dogs impounded in 1976 and 29 were destroyed. In May 1977, there was a total of 173 dogs, 43 of which were destroyed.

CITY COMMISSIONER Robert Smith doesn't feel cats should be included in the city ordinance.

"They do not bother people as dogs do," he said.

Mackillop disagreed.

"They dig up gardens and defecate in people's yards. Last week I had calls of two cases of cats attacking children," he said. "It used to be that the dogs killed the cats, but since we've been trying to control the dogs the cat population has been increasing."

Also, he said, cats carry more disease because there is no way of catching them and giving them shots.

"And if a stray cat bites you, you have to have rabies shots because the cats are difficult to catch for observation. Many of the cats look alike thus making identification difficult," he said.

The law also protects animals.

"We have a brand new state law which makes it a class B misdemeanor to be cruel to animals," said Glenda Heldenbrand, president of the Riley County Humane Society.

SHE SAID she receives at least one call a day reporting cruelty to animals. The Humane Society usually calls on the people to see the cruelty is stopped. Failure to comply would bring litigation against the pet owner, she said. Animal cruelty includes depriving the animal of shelter and necessary sustenance, torture of the animal and overworking it.

She told of a case last year when a pet owner failed to remove a chain around a puppy's neck. The puppy grew into a large dog and the chain became embedded in its neck and had to be removed surgically.

"Some people stereotype us as little old ladies in tennis shoes with hundreds of animals in our homes. But they don't realize we are only trying to help," Heldenbrand said.

She believes the pet problem can be solved, but certain changes are needed.

"Our city has some good regulations but the problem is enforcing them. More staff and equipment are needed," she said. There are presently one full-time and two part-time animal wardens. Two other staff persons manage the animal shelter.

UNSPAYED DOGS should cost much more to license than the spayed and castrated dogs and cats should also be included in the licensing and registration ordinance, Heldenbrand said.

"When you hit people in their pocketbooks they wake up to the problem," she said.

She said she hopes the city and county will get together to build a common animal shelter which will be run by the Riley County Humane Society. City Manager Les Rieger is in favor of the joint animal shelter.

"The pet problem is not just a problem of Manhattan, it is a county-wide problem," he said. "I am sure there are pets taken from the city and abandoned outside the city limits and the other way around."

"If we make the effort county-wide we can achieve some efficiency in personnel and products needed in the shelter," he said.

REIGER SAID he hopes the Humane Society will play a large part in setting up and running the shelter if the idea is approved by the rest of the county.

At a joint meeting of the city and county commissions Monday the Riley County Humane Society was unofficially designated to conduct a feasibility study on construction of a city-county animal shelter. Rieger said a formal resolution on the decision will be issued soon.

According to Heldenbrand, a rough draft of the study is expected in two months. There will also be recommendations on license fees, penalties for disobeying pet laws and a decision on what will be done with the increasing population of stray cats.

"They will be given free reign to come up with any suggestions they think are appropriate," Rieger said.

HE SAID the final decision on the proposed shelter would be ready by May 1, 1978 so the project can be included in the 1978-79 budget.

Rieger also said the present city animal shelter at Sunset Zoo will house zoo animals that need protection from severe weather upon completion of a new shelter.

Much of the concern over the suggested county-wide shelter centers around its funding. Smith said he would not register a definite opinion on the proposal until he knows how much the project is going to cost. However, he said he would prefer that any county-wide animal shelter be self-supporting.

Rieger said the city currently spends $25,951 annually on the city animal shelter.

City Commissioner Terry Glasscock said he thinks funds should be generated from licensing and fines to complement the present allocation.

"I would favor a higher fee for unsprayed and uncastrated dogs. This will also help solve the problem of overpopulation," he said.

K-State's nuclear reactor aids research

K-State has a nuclear reactor. The TRIGA (Training, Research, Isotope, General Atomic) Mark II reactor is located just behind Ward Hall.

"The reactor was completed in October 1962," Dean Eckhoff, head of the department of nuclear engineering said. "The reactor cost about a quarter million dollars initially, but is worth about a half million dollars, a good bit of that is due to inflation." Eckhoff said the reactor is used for educational purposes, operator training and research.

"All the nuclear engineering students get a modest amount of operation training with the reactor their senior year," Eckhoff said. "This helps them qualify for further study. It is not enough to know the theory behind the operation of the reactor, a person must know how to actually run one."

"We not only do research on the physics of the reactor but help other departments with their research," Eckhoff said. "If groups want to use the reactor for research then we try to accommodate them. The reactor is here to serve the people; it is nothing more than a tool we use in research."

IN A STUDY sponsored by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC), the risk of fatalities caused by a nuclear reactor accident was listed as one in five million. Eckhoff said the chances of some type of accident happening at K-State is even less than indicated in the NRC's study.

"The reactor is designed so the chances of the reactor blowing up are immeasurably small," Eckhoff said. "We just go ahead and call it zero per cent."

"There is no real danger of working around the reactor," Eckhoff said. "We have air samplers, geiger tubes, radiation personnel monitors and other devices to tell if a person is being exposed to lethal doses of radiation. Probably the biggest danger is some body falling off the top of the reactor."

ECKHOFF SAID the reactor comes under direct control of the NRC.

"They come around about once a year and look our operation over," Eckhoff said. "They get real picky about a lot of things but so far we have not received a citation from them yet."

Eckhoff said fear of someone breaking into the reactor to steal the nuclear material to make a bomb is absurd.

"Only the uninformed person would try to do something like that," Eckhoff said. "The informed person knows we don't have enough nuclear material to make a bomb and even if we did have enough the fuel that we do have isn't rich enough to be bomb material."

"It would be a lot easier to subvert some Air Force bomber crew with a million dollars and get an already made bomb, than it would be to try get past the security system and remove the nuclear material without exposing yourself to radiation."

Minority engineering students to be tutored

The College of Engineering will offer a summer tutoring institute from July 18 to Aug. 12, for minority high school graduates who intend to enroll in engineering this fall.

Funding for the institute, in its second year, is through a grant from the Westinghouse Educational Foundation, Pittsburgh, Pa.

The institute is designed to provide students with remedial work in algebra, trigonometry, chemistry, and physics. Herbert Ball, assistant professor of mechanical engineering and Duane Walker, instructor of electrical engineering will tutor the institute.

About 20 students are expected in the program this year. Last year there were 12 students, 11 of whom were still enrolled in engineering at the end of last semester.

"We hope to build on last year's experience and provide an educational service which will be of even greater benefit to this year's participants," said Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering.

Participants will receive travel expenses, a small stipend for out-of-pocket costs and room and board in a University residence hall.

Blind persons play baseball; beeping ball is hitting aid

By BARBARA RUST
Collegian Reporter

Blind persons can do anything—even play baseball.

All it takes is some modification, said Gary Marshall, a former Houston Astros pitcher, at a Manhattan beep baseball planning session Wednesday night.

"Five players are on each team and all are blindfolded," Marshall, who was blinded in a car accident in 1965, said. "Anything but total blindness will have to be blindfolded."

Each team has a pitcher and a catcher who are sighted. It's important to have a pitcher who is reliable, consistent and pitches the ball at the same speed to the batter each time.

"If you can't hit the ball, you will have a hard time winning the game," he said. "The pitcher will state when he's ready to throw the ball. He will say, 'ready,' and then, 'pitch,' when the ball leaves his hands. He has to say it loud enough to be heard by the defensive team behind him."

THE BATTER hits the ball which constantly beeps. Each batter is allowed five strikes and three outs are allowed during each inning. Because there is no second base, the batter runs to either first or third base. Each base has a solid tone which the umpire arbitrarily activates.

"Spotters help the defense locate the ball," Marshall said. "After the ball is hit, the spotter can either name the player whose direction the ball is coming in, or he can say 'duck' if he gives any other assistance, it is an automatic run for the other team."

The National Beep Baseball Championship will be held in Lawrence on Sept. 16 through 18 at Holcomb Sports Complex. Ten teams from many cities including Phoenix, San Antonio, Lawrence, San Francisco, Chicago and St. Paul will participate.

"We want to have the game so well-known that we can have regional tournaments and have regional champions coming to the national tournaments," Marshall said. "All players, except the pitcher and catcher, are blind in the national tournament."

BEEP BASEBALL DAY in Lawrence is July 18. Celebrities, including the mayor, sports figures, radio celebrities and city commissioners will play against the blind players.

"The Lawrence team is the only one that is active in Kansas. We are trying to get them (beep baseball teams) started in Wichita, Manhattan, Topeka, and Kansas City," Marshall said.

The beep baseball team in Manhattan wants to involve recreational services. Big Brothers — Big Sisters and other sighted groups, said Ann Kruse, who received her master's in English in May from K-State.

Sale of fireworks sparks concern among area officials

ACCORDING to Stites his reasoning is based on his childhood experiences and the fact that he took great delight as a boy shooting fireworks.

"I have a strong, happy remembrance of those days," he said. "I believe that the younger generation should also experience the fun and thrill of shooting fireworks."

"There have been so many restrictions put on the younger generation that they do not seem to have the fun we had in yesterdays."

According to Stites, much of the reasoning behind the proposed ban of fireworks is "couched in terms of safety."

"It really is based on the fact that the noise from fireworks is annoying to older people," Stites said. "I believe we can put up with this noise for a few short days each and every year."

MUCH OF the controversy ended in December 1976 with the U.S. Consumer Product Safety Commission (CPSC) order, according to Russell Collins, chief deputy of the state fire marshalls office.

The CPSC permits the sale of firecrackers containing a maximum of 50 milligrams of explosive powder.

"The 50 milligrams limitation would only permit the sale of the small firecrackers commonly known as ladyfingers," Collins said.

The CPSC decision provides for performance specifications for common firework devices including a requirement that fuses burn at least three-seconds but not longer than six-seconds.

CPSC rejected a total ban on fireworks because of the probability that such an action would increase illegal trafficking and bootlegging of larger, more dangerous firecrackers, Collins said.

ACCORDING to the Riley County Police Department (RCPD), fireworks can go on sale within the city limits July 1.

"No fireworks can be sold or shot before July 1 within the city limits," said Willis Penhollow, RCPD director.

"The state of Kansas sets the guidelines for the counties," Penhollow said. "These state regulations do not supercede city ordinances prohibiting sale and handling of fireworks."

"That is why there are firework stands set-up outside the city limits," Penhollow said. "In the county, fireworks went on sale June 27."

THE POLICE department makes periodic checks of area fireworks stands.

"We confiscate fireworks that are illegal to sell," Penhollow said. "It has a psychological affect on the other dealers that they know we are checking to see the types of fireworks they are selling."

"Property damage was in the thousands of dollars in 1976 when one considers replacing lawn and trees," said William Smith, Manhattan fire chief.

"The main problem is safety of young people who are allowed to use fireworks without adult supervision," Smith said.

"Even sparklers can set a child's clothing on fire."

Vehicles must be assessed annually

TOPEKA (AP) — The law requires that owners of motor vehicles inform the county assessor by March 1 each year on the number of vehicles they have, according to an opinion released Thursday by the attorney general.

Some Kansas counties already require that owners come in to the assessor's office each year to list motor vehicles. But others, particularly the larger counties, have handled the procedure for several years automatically by using registration and renewal forms.

Atty. Gen. Curt Schneider said that latter method is a violation of state law.

The opinion marked an about-face from an earlier conclusion that the automatic listing of motor vehicles at the time of registration and renewal was acceptable.

Schneider said a careful study of the law, as amended in 1970, shows that the automatic listing provision was repealed.

There is no question the 1970 amendment to the law made it no longer legal for listings to be accomplished at the time of registration, thereby exempting taxpayers from listing vehicles each March 1, Schneider said.

Fitness school stresses individual development

By DEBBIE BURKLAND
Collegian Reporter

The Sports Fitness School at K-State is designed to teach children physical activities they can use later in life as well as those they can use now.

"The emphasis of the school isn't just providing physical activity for the sake of physical activity but to provide physical activity to develop the child's ability," said Pat Murray, a sports fitness program instructor.

The school started four years ago. It was developed by Larry Noble, coordinator of the Division of Continuing Education's Sports Fitness School.

"One purpose of the program is providing a fitness school for the kids," Murray said. It's also helping Noble gather data for a research study on physical fitness factors, he said. Noble has appointed Tabor Medill, director of the gymnastics program, in charge of running the school this summer.

"RESEARCH SHOWS a child who is physically active tends to grow larger than the child who is not," Murray said. Research on muscles in particular shows strength exercises will make the muscle fibers larger, but not increase the number of fibers.

"We are not so concerned about competition (in the program) because research has shown that competition can be destructive for the majority of the kids," Murray said. "Competition can be constructive if put in the proper perspective where the competition is with yourself," he said. The school, concerned with learning skills and how to play games in the proper manner, emphasizes sportsmanship.

"As long as the child improves on his own performance, he has won," he said. "I think this is one thing in physical education or in sports that we've neglected, because we've overemphasized the competitiveness, the winning."

This year, about 30 children are attending the school and most are from the Manhattan area. More boys are enrolled than girls.

The school, which meets from 8:30 a.m. to 11:30 a.m. Monday, Wednesday and Friday, includes a one-and-a-half hour activity period, a 30-minute break and one hour of swimming under the instruction of John Merriman, summer swimming program director.

Plans underway for rec complex

Plans for the new recreational complex are in initial, architectural states.

"Schematic drawings of the future rec complex that will be located at L.P. Washburn Field are now being looked at and will be up for approval by the Recreation Committee in July," said Vince Cool, assistant vice president for university development.

Groundbreaking is tentatively scheduled for next spring. Groundbreaking to completion time is estimated at two years, Cool said. The new facilities will include multi-purpose basketball courts, handball, racquetball and squash courts, a weight apparatus room and locker rooms.

Police Captain Paul Sciffignano

"Twenty-one years ago when I was a patrolman, I got one of Cancer's Warning Signals, hoarseness. I went to the doctor fast. It was cancer of the larynx. A short while later they operated."

"Seven months later I was back on my beat. Less than three years later I competed with 900 other cops in a physical and mental exam and got my Sergeant's stripes."

"And here I am today, the father of four, full of life and cured of cancer. Know Cancer's 7 Warning Signals and give to the American Cancer Society. We want to wipe out cancer in your lifetime."

Cancer's 7 Warning Signals: 1-Change in bowel or bladder habits. 2-A sore that does not heal. 3-Unusual bleeding or discharge. 4-Thickening or lump in breast or elsewhere. 5-Indigestion or difficulty in swallowing. 6-Obvious change in wart or mole. 7-Nagging cough or hoarseness.

New regulations affect drug centers

By DIXIE HOLMES

Collegian Reporter

Although the intent of new federal and state drug center regulations is to upgrade mental health services, many persons involved in Kansas programs fear the regulations will defeat that purpose by cutting back or eliminating existing services.

Ed Oliver, coordinator of the Manhattan Drug Abuse Project, is particularly concerned with the effect the licensing regulations will have on halfway houses and transitional living groups.

"The rules aren't specifically aimed at halfway houses, but they will affect them," he said. "It's simply a question of economics."

The new regulations require centers to file reports, keep records, regulate out-patient treatment and hire qualified professionals to staff the centers.

"Drug users typically don't want anything on paper about their visits to a center so if we have to keep records we will lose patients," Oliver said.

Oliver also said he believed there is no way these centers could regulate out-patient treatment when many contacts are occasional walk-ins.

"Most of these people don't want much to be known about them so they wouldn't submit to scheduled treatment," he said. "Even if they did, we couldn't handle the work load."

OLIVER'S main objection to the licensing rules is their application to all drug centers regardless of whether they receive federal money.

"The regulations are arbitrary and indiscriminate. They set a standard of pseudo-professionalism that small, innovative programs can't afford to meet so they are eliminated," Oliver said.

Jim Colvin, former operator of the Alternative, a now-defunct halfway house in Junction City, agreed regulations would cause problems for drug centers.

Colvin and his wife, a nurse, opened the crisis center as an initial contact place where they tried to build the trust of a person before referring him to professional help.

"When kids wanted help from drugs, they were told to go to their family physicians. These doctors knew their parents so there was no way the kids would do that," Colvin said.

"Many of them went to the local sheriff and it put him in a bind. He wanted to help but it was also his job to bust them," Colvin said. "He (the sheriff) suggested we open the center."

THE COLVIN'S center closed in 1975 due to lack of funds. It was staffed mainly by former drug users. That, Colvin said, is the reason new licensing regulations requiring professional staff will hurt other drug centers.

"Psychiatrists are good for referrals but the kids that come to these houses aren't to that stage yet," he said. "They need peer level advice before they're willing to trust anyone else."

To Philip Bamsemer, alcohol counselor at the North Central Kansas Guidance Center, the new regulations will mean more patients. Because many programs may close, the guidance center's referral rate is expected to double, he said.

"It is a failure of the federal government that good programs will shut down," Bamsemer said.

GLEN LEONARDI, coordinator of the Community Addictive Treatment Center in Topeka, said the regulations will have an effect on their budget.

"They (the regulations) are a good point of reference to work from but they need a year or so to get organized so they don't push other groups under," Leonardi said.

He said he believes the report and filing requirements were intended to cut state costs more than improve drug centers and failed to take into consideration the effects on halfway houses and transitional living groups that don't need to be documented so heavily.

FOR K-STATE'S Drug Education Center (DEC), its budget cut last spring by Student Senate, the regulations are another financial problem.

Filing standards will mean every contact counseled must have a five-page monthly report filed on them, according to Oliver.

Originally, community mental health centers and hospitals were to be exempt, but an attempt is being made to extend regulations to include them. If that happens, Mental Health Services (MHS) at Lafene Student Health Center would have to comply.

Robert Sinnett, (MHS director, said most programs would probably have to comply anyway to continue getting Title 19 funds for reimbursement of services. Sinnett said he is not against the regulations, but opposes enforcing them without offering financial help needed to comply with them.

"It is a nice idea," Sinnett said. "The aim is to offer high quality service, but instead it may mean less service."

Hijacker takes bus to runway, kills two

NEW YORK (AP) — A man described as "racially upset" hijacked an interstate bus with an estimated 12 to 15 passengers aboard Monday, then ordered the bus onto busy Kennedy Airport runways in a demand for $6 million in ransom and a plane to fly him out of the country.

Two persons aboard the bus, including the bus driver, were shot and killed by the hijacker before the bus was cornered near an airport hangar, authorities said. A third man was wounded.

At least three other persons reportedly were released from the vehicle unharmed.

The airport was closed for about 90 minutes, stacking up inbound planes and blocking outbound holiday travelers, while the bus and pursuing policemen were on the runways.

THE GUNMAN was described as a Spanish-speaking, 5-foot-5 black wearing blue jeans. Police later discounted reports that he had one or two accomplices.

Besides the ransom, the hijacker demanded a plane with a 3,000-mile range to fly him out of the country to an undisclosed destination.

A New York City police team was negotiating with the man.

The wounded bus passenger, John McGavern, 50, quoted the gunman as telling his captives he had been badly treated in the United States and wanted to get out.

McGAVERN, a librarian at the University of Hartford, was shot in the neck when the gunman took over the bus in the New York City borough of the Bronx.

"He was racially upset, very upset about the racial situation," McGavern said in an interview from a stretcher at Jamaica Hospital.

McGavern said that after he was shot, the gunman ordered the driver to take the bus south across Long Island to Kennedy, where it crashed through a security barrier and onto the runways of one of busiest airports in the nation.

The bus eventually was cornered at a Trans World Airlines hangar, and McGavern was ordered out to deliver the gunman's demands.

AS THE BUS careened around the runways, the airport was closed to all flights at 2:50 p.m.

Not until the vehicle was cornered was the airport reopened at about 4:15 p.m. By that time, domestic and international flights were stacked up in the air.

Police vehicles, including a military-type armored personnel carrier loaded with armed New York City policemen, surrounded the bus at the landing field side of a TWA maintenance and administrative complex that also houses the airline's heavily secured VIP area.

The dead — a woman passenger in addition to the bus driver, were slain after the bus reached the airport.

U.S. forgets problems, spends quiet 201st

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
America's 201st birthday couldn't compare with the festivities of its 200th. What could? But in most places a decade of bad feelings and dissension seemed well in the past, and on July 4, 1977, most Americans just took time off to enjoy the fireworks.

In most places, the tone was friendly. Attendance was up at parades, boat races and picnics. In city after city, officials said, citizens were more receptive to patriotic display. Dissidence was not the widespread counterpoint it had been through Vietnam and Watergate. Everywhere there were efforts, on a smaller scale, to recreate the feelings of the Bicentennial Fourth.

On this July 4th, it was a happy crowd in lower Manhattan, N.Y., where each year an actor reads the Declaration of Independence and its list of Grievances against George III. Two years ago, when the actor did that, the list drew jeers — and calls to impeach Richard Nixon.

In the nation's capital, some 250,000 people were expected to attend the fireworks display at the Mall between Capitol Hill and the Lincoln Memorial. The National Archives sealed a time capsule filled with memorabilia from the Bicentennial last year to be uncapped for the Tricentennial.

"Collective relief," was the way Larry Peacosaw it. A health care worker, he was relaxing against a tree in West Potomac Park and he talked about his feelings:

"I feel more relaxed. . . Maybe the last of the Watergate ghosts have been exorcised. . . People don't take themselves so seriously anymore."

Disability pension cheating common

WASHINGTON (AP) — A former federal clerk, drawing a pension because he was classified as totally disabled, opened a jui-jitsu school and was allowed to keep his government stipend.

Another "totally disabled" federal pensioner earned $76,793 in one year in a new career, on top of his $4,848 pension.

A 45-year-old cook was given a disability retirement by the U.S. Civil Service Commission because of a sinus problem.

These cases are drawn from official files of the civil service disability retirement system that pays 279,000 retired federal workers about .5 billion a year, financed mostly by the taxpayers.

As the examples illustrate, a federal civil servant can be able to work and still get a disability pension. He can make more money in a new career than he did at his old government job and still keep his pension, if he plays the loopholes correctly.

And if he cheats by failing to report excessive earnings, there is virtually no chance the government will catch him — except by accident. Even then the worst that is likely to happen is that he would lose the pension, although such cheating constitutes fraud. Civil Service Commission lawyers say they can't remember the last time anyone was prosecuted for ripping off the disability pension system.

"We've got a liberal disability provision compared to private industry, there's no denying that," said Thomas Tinsley, retirement director at the Civil Service Commission.

THE VAST majority of disability pensioners probably are playing by the government's liberal rules. The typical disability pensioner retired at age 51 or 52 with a heart condition, arthritis or cancer. Disability pensioners have a death rate 5 to 23 times higher than active federal employees the same age. And about two-thirds of all disability pensioners report no outside earnings.

Yet officials admit that it is relatively easy to get a pension, that many disability pensioners could still hold a government job and that cheating and fraud do occur and usually go unnoticed and unpunished.

To get a disability pension a federal civil servant need only be declared medically unable to perform one part of his job efficiently. The jui-jitsu school operator, while obviously able-bodied, kept his pension because a psychiatrist judged him mentally unable to perform his old federal job.

The GAO, which criticized the system in a report last December, said the commission's doctors may be too lenient in applying even the present liberal standard. Citing the example of the cook who retired with a bad sinus condition, GAO said its own medical consultant considered the hot kitchen an ideal workplace for the sinus sufferer.

THE SYSTEM attempts to cut off disability pensions to those who can and do earn a good salary.

The law requires cancellation of pensions for those who earn, for two years in a row, more than 80 per cent of what their old job presently pays. But the rule is easily manipulated or ignored.

For example, the pensioner who earned $76,793 in 1974 reported earning only $8,033 the next year. That was less than 80 per cent of his old job's pay, so he kept his pension.

The files did not reveal how he earned the money.

The commission is all but helpless when pensioners break the 80 per cent rule but conceal their income. Pensioners are required to report earned income by means of a postcard questionnaire, but the commission makes no regular attempt to verify what they report.

"There is no way to police that," Tinsley said. "About the only way we get them is when a neighbor gets mad and turns them in."

The National Association of Retired Federal Employees, which claims about 300,000 members, complains that agencies often pressure employees to take disability retirements. Association president John McClelland said he favors greater efforts to assign employees with medical problems to light-duty jobs.

Citizenship difficult to obtain

Students face visa problems

By BARBARA RUST
Collegian Reporter

Although many K-Staters were born in the U.S., others wait years to become naturalized citizens.

"I came to the U.S. to attend graduate school at Columbia University in physics," said Suresh Chandra, visiting assistant professor of physics. Chandra received his B.S. in physics from the University of Delhi. He then got a student visa in 1966 to get his M.S. and Ph.D. at Columbia.

"Getting a student visa is pretty automatic once you've been admitted to a school in the U.S. and have proof of economic self-sufficiency," he said. "In fact, I had more difficulty getting a passport from India than a visa from the U.S."

K-Stater co-authors chemistry textbook

A new textbook designed to ease some of the frustrations of students in inorganic chemistry has been co-authored by a K-State faculty member.

The book, "Inorganic Chemistry," compares the class notes of Keith Purcell, K-State associate professor of chemistry, and former K-State professor John Kotz, chemistry professor at State University of New York at Oneonta.

Using student input, the textbook has many illustrations and diagrams to help students. The book will be used mainly by K-State seniors and first-year graduate students in chemistry, biochemistry and chemical engineering.

The text has also been selected for use at the University of Kansas, University of New Mexico, University of California at Los Angeles, Illinois Institute of Technology, Purdue and Georgetown.

Six years ago Chandra wanted to become a permanent U.S. resident, but not a citizen. He thought he might want to return to India eventually.

"I wanted my permanent residence visa (green card) so I could be in the U.S. as long as I wanted and when I wanted," he said. "I wanted permanent residence status six years ago, but I did not apply because I heard the procedure took about a year."

IN JUNE 1975, Chandra applied for his green card and he received it on June 9, 1977. Because his files were lost in the Milwaukee office of Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) and he recently moved from Wisconsin to Kansas, it took longer for him to become a permanent resident.

"I must have my green card with me at all times," Chandra said. "I'm not allowed to vote, but I'm eligible for draft."

One year ago, Chandra decided to become a U.S. citizen. After getting the permanent residence visa, he must wait five years before he can apply for citizenship.

"In the case of a person who is married to an American spouse, the waiting period is three years," he said.

AFTER five years, he will complete an application, show no criminal record, attend an interview and attend the swearing-in ceremony.

"I like a lot of things about the United States," Chandra said. "I like the freedom in the United States. In any situation, there is room for improvement, but as we have over here, it is pretty good. I like the fact U.S. is composed of a large variety of people who immigrated."

Chandra had little difficulty adjusting to the United States. He did miss walks in the park at night when he was in New York City. His bad experience was getting mugged when he was walking off

Broadway. Since then, he has reserve money he calls, "mugging money."

"I felt greater homesickness going from my small city of Pilibhit to Delhi than from Delhi to New York City," Chandra said.

Some people have less difficulty getting permanent residence status than Chandra.

ARUNA MICHIE, visiting assistant professor in political science, had a student visa in 1962 at Smith College in Massachusetts. She then went back to India to work with the Peace Corps where she met her husband, a U.S. citizen. Within one week after being married, she had her permanent residence status.

Michie completed visa forms at the American Embassy in India. She submitted information from the police in Massachusetts that she didn't have a police record. She paid visa fees and was a permanent resident in one week. By being married to an American, Michie got immediate relative status.

Few people from India would marry an American. Michie's parents' marriage was both inter-culture and inter-caste, but no orthodox Hindu would marry outside his subcaste.

"My family is from a different tradition," Michie said. "My maternal grandfather has a Ph.D. and my paternal grandfather is a magistrate. I have an un-traditional background."

OAKLAND, Calif. — Black Panther Huey Newton, back in his native land after a 2½-year exile, spent the Fourth of July in a jail cell where police said he was being treated "just like any other prisoner in here on a murder charge."

Sheldon Otis, attorney for the 35-year-old cofounder of the Black Panthers, said Newton hoped to win his freedom on bail when he is arraigned Tuesday on murder and assault charges in Oakland Municipal Court.

Newton, who fled to Cuba early in 1974, returned here Sunday after stopping in Canada for a week to help arrange his return. He was greeted at San Francisco International Airport by 500 ecstatic supporters chanting "Justice for Huey" — a reminder of the crowds that angrily chanted "Free Huey" on the Oakland courthouse steps during his 1968 trial in the slaying of an Oakland policeman.

LIBREVILLE, Gabon — Uganda's President Idi Amin, addressing the African summit conference with a pistol strapped to his waist, said Monday he had foiled a Western-inspired conspiracy to murder him and several other African leaders.

Bystanders outside the conference building cheered and applauded Amin for the third straight day when he arrived wearing a dark-blue air marshal's battle dress studded with medal ribbons. He carried a large hunting cane which he said was "a gift from Scotland."

He was the only chief of state at the summit to be cheered at virtually every public appearance.

A black African delegate outside the conference hall turned to a reporter and said:

"Amin is a disgrace to all of Africa, but he is also the most popular man on this continent. There is a mystique of bigness and arrogance about him that fascinates the average African. If you elected a king of all Africa, Amin would win."

AMERICUS, Ga. — Buddy Cochran, accused of ramming his sports car into a speaker's platform full of Ku Klux Klansmen, has received several offers of financial and legal aid from around the country, the Sumter County sheriff's office says.

"We got one or two calls last night offering free legal advice — one was from New York — and we got some calls from Texas, Oregon and California offering to help with his bond," Deputy Chip Hutchinson said Monday.

Cochran, a 30-year-old truck mechanic from Americus, is being held under bonds totaling $190,000. He is charged with 19 counts of aggravated assault in connection with the incident at Saturday night's Klan rally in Plains.

Authorities said Cochran apparently got into an argument with several Klan supporters at the rally, climbed into his late-model Jaguar, drove through the crowd of spectators and reporters and slammed into the speakers platform.

Eighteen persons were hospitalized with injuries.

MONTREUX, Switzerland — Vladimir Nabokov, the Russian-American author of "Lolita" regarded as one of the finest prose stylists in modern literature, is dead at age 78.

Vera Nabokov, his wife of 52 years, said the writer succumbed to a virus infection Saturday at the small suite in the Palace Hotel overlooking Lake Geneva that was the couple's home since 1961.

The success of "Lolita," which added the word "nymphet" to the English vernacular, enabled the writer to dedicate the final years of his life to writing and, with his son Dmitri, translating his earlier Russian novels into English.

Nabokov wrote nearly a score of novels, including nine in Russian under the pseudonym V. Sirin, numerous short stories, a memoir, "Speak Memory," a translation of Pushkin's "Evgeny Onegin," and a few works of criticism.

Aggieville's style alters over the years

By SHEREE LOWE
Collegian Reporter

From soda fountains to bars, dance halls to discos and cafes to fast food establishments, Aggieville has changed with the times.

In the late 1800's the now familiar streets of Aggieville were lined with room and boarding houses rented to students attending Kansas State Agricultural College (KSAC).

The earliest building for business purposes in Aggieville was in the early 1900's. KSAC was then known as the K-State Aggies and this is how the oldest shopping center in Kansas acquired its name.

In the early years of Aggieville, the business district consisted of cafes, book stores, dance halls and candy kitchens where sodas and candies were sold.

"Social life in the 40s and 50s were the dance halls," said Ted Varney, owner of Varney's bookstore. "The dances cost 75 cents and there was always live music. The Harrison Hall was the place to go, either stag or with a date. On the second floor of the dance hall were 10,000 buggy springs to dance on."

"If you didn't have a date you simply cut in on dances, but we all knew the last dance was reserved for the girl's date," Varney said. "After the dance we usually went to the soda fountain for a five cent coke at the drug store and then you walked your girl home."

THE MAIN form of transportation used by students until the early 50s was a trolley car that ran on tracks through Aggieville and downtown Manhattan.

Going to taverns for a beer or a club for a drink has not always been common and acceptable behavior.

"In the 40s and 50s there were a couple of taverns in Aggieville, but very few girls patronized them," said Jon Levine, manager of Varney's Bookstore. "Aggie Lou was the one place girls went in masses until the dean of women found out and put it off limits."

"Consequently, since the girls didn't go to the bars, neither did the guys. Instead everyone went to the Canteen, which was right across from the campus and served as the main hang-out between classes and at night. Geedunk, a beverage of Coke, vanilla ice cream, malt and chocolate syrup was the Canteen's specialty," Levine said.

NEXT DOOR to the Canteen was Dolly K's Lunch. The seating capacity was 12 to 15 people and Dolly fed the football team lunch daily. In the late 50s the cafes went out of business when the K-State Union and drive-in restaurants started serving students' needs.

The taverns in Aggieville developed in the past 20 years, with private clubs developing in the last five years. Aggieville now has 10 bars frequently patronized by students.

"This new development in Aggieville was due to a vacuum dealing with students' needs and wants. Whenever this vacuum occurs someone is going to fill those needs and this is why Aggieville has the business it does," Varney said.

Newspaper faces photo confiscation

Mr. Miller strikes again.

Vern Miller, Sedgwick county district attorney, is demanding photographs of a drug raid from the Wichita Eagle-Beacon. The newspaper refuses to release the unpublished photographs, and rightfully so.

Miller's men forgot to take their cameras to the raid, so they asked Jerry Clark, the newspaper's photographer to take pictures for them. Miller claims Clark agreed; Clark claims he said he would have to get permission from his editors.

The permission was denied and the photos remain in the Eagle-Beacon's files.

The photos are the property of the paper. They represent a form of information and as such should not be released to Miller.

BY DEMANDING the release of the photos, Miller is asking the newspaper, in essence, to reveal privileged information. It would be a dangerous precedent for the press if Miller obtains the photos.

If Miller is given the photos, what will he demand next? He may demand the names of the paper's news sources, he may demand to see what will be printed in the next day's paper.

Miller is again showing his ignorance of first amendment guarantees. The freedom of the press should include the freedom to keep the names of confidential sources, and photographs, out of the hands of government officials.

Press freedom is an essential element of freedom of thought and freedom of speech. If we begin allowing officials to confiscate the files of the media, we are condoning a police state.

Sex needs open discussion

The Carter administration is planning to set aside funds for schools to provide adequate sex education. It's about time.

The proliferation of teen-age pregnancies is reaching almost epidemic proportions, as is the incidence of venereal disease among teenagers. The most effective means of combating this disheartening occurrence is through proper and timely education.

Sex education traditionally is consigned to the family, but many parents ignore their responsibilities, or when they do finally communicate the "facts of life," to their youngsters, it is too late.

In this era of sexual revolution and permissiveness, it is extremely important for young people to learn about sex from someone other than their peers. Usually by the age of 13, a person has been informed, often misinformed, about sex. The information comes from the streets, a pass-around kind of knowledge with little foundation in fact.

THE SCHOOLS have been covertly expected to fulfill this educational role which parents cannot seem to fill. So, physical education teachers show films, separate films to boys and girls, supposedly explaining all they need to know. These films are seldom accompanied by open discussion and reveal only enough information to be enticing rather than informative.

Granted, many high schools now have progressive sex education courses. Unfortunately, high school is not soon enough. Sex education should begin as soon as a child begins to question how he came to be. With the onset of puberty now at 10.8 years-of-age for girls, sex education needs to begin in grade school.

By promoting a factual, rational approach to sex, the number of teenage pregnancies would surely decrease. The incidence of premarital sex among teenagers may not lessen, but with more information about birth control and VD teenagers will be able to better prepare themselves to make their own value judgments about premarital sex.

It is now the responsibility of the schools to inform youngsters about sex and the responsibility of the parents to examine the moral and emotional questions of sex.

With more knowledge about this "closet" issue, teenagers will be allowed and able to make rational decisions.

Alcohol abuses ignored

(Re: Ken Miller's editorial, "Oh the sins of alcohol")

Editor,

There's something bitterly funny about Ken Miller. It's not just all his little assinine comments about the sins of alcohol, it's his whole attitude that ignores the simple fact that too much alcohol is bad.

It's about time that all the Ken Millers of the world realize that alcohol is a health problem and not a moral one. It is also about time, that they realize that liquor laws in Kansas are not due to a "handful of reactionary Chicken Littles" but to a majority of Kansas citizens. Liquor by the drink was rejected by vote of the people not just the legislators.

Mr. Miller calls Kansas and its liquor laws, "insulting, provincial, hypocritical and illogical." Each state has the right to establish liquor laws. The current laws against liquor by the drink were established in November of 1970 when a majority of Kansans voted to prohibit liquor by the drink sales. Article 15, Section 10 of the Kansas Constitution prohibits open saloons and thus the basis for a 10-day waiting period for club membership. And what may I ask is hypocritical about enforcing laws that people endorse?

WHAT IS truly insulting is Mr. Miller's righteousness about drinking when he displays obvious ignorance about alcoholism. He writes that "the underlying fear behind all Kansas liquor laws is that of alcoholism." This "fear" is based on the recognition that alcoholism is a problem and the knowledge that societal attitudes contribute to the disease.

I am additionally insulted by Mr. Miller's argument that Kansas should keep up with the Jones. While Mr. Miller is worried that the rest of the nation is laughing at Kansas perhaps he should note that we are not alone. Oklahoma has liquor by the drink laws and numerous states have age as well as other requirements. Instead of 3.3 million earplugs, he should wish for help for the nation's nine million alcoholics, 450,000 of which are under the age of 21.

Finally, Mr. Miller objects to "someone looking out for me and my behavior." Yes, we all have the freedom to be wrong. But Mr. Miller, are you as adamant about age of consent laws, drug laws (which affect a quarter of a million hard-drug addicts in comparison to the nine million alcoholics), auto-safety laws or smoking laws? These are only a few of the laws that legislate our well-being. The most important point here however, is that alcohol abuse affects more than just the drinker. We have the freedom to hurt ourselves perhaps, but certainly not the freedom to hurt others.

Ken Miller is right — most Kansans are not a bunch of mindless idiots. That is why Kansas has liquor laws. Mr. Miller, I suggest you purchase yourself a set of earplugs so you won't hear us laughing at you.

Victim not 'uninjured'

Editor,

It distresses me when the Collegian and Mercury describe a woman who reported she was raped as "uninjured" and "not seriously injured" respectively. Such statements totally ignore the grave psychological and emotional trauma rape victims suffer — injuries that may never heal completely.

Rape is a violent act that inflicts serious trauma. To report otherwise is to encourage the myth that rape is a sexual game women pretend not to like and is an unconscionable affront to anyone so victimized.

I do not feel either paper wishes to do this. I hope, therefore, news reports in the future will evidence a greater sensitivity towards and understanding of this particular crime of violence.

Farm youths exchange experiences

By STEVE CARTER
Collegian Reporter

Since 1948, more than 4,000 youths from 69 countries have exchanged experiences and educated one another through The International Farm Youth Exchange (IFYE).

IFYE is a project sponsored by 4-H which selects rural youths from the U.S. and 35 cooperating host countries to live and work with farm families in other countries for four to six months.

Trevor McLean, a youth from Strathalbyn, Australia, was in Manhattan last week before going on to meet his host families. McLean said he became interested in the project through his membership in the Rural Youth Movement (RYM) of South Australia, which is similar to America's 4-H clubs.

Kansas was not what McLean expected.

"I must admit I was almost disappointed in that I had heard of Kansas as being one big wheat prairie. I didn't expect to see a tree. I expected to see a house every few miles and lots of self-propelled combines, but I haven't seen any of that yet. But I anticipate as I go further west that I will see more of what I expected, more of the wheat farming," McLean said.

"I was amazed to see Kansas has trees, rivers and a lot of things the rest of America has, of course, but I honestly didn't expect it in Kansas. It's more attractive than I expected," he said.

McLEAN is looking forward to "just living with families, particularly farm families and seeing the attitudes of the children and of the parents."

From the farming point of view, McLean's interest is to see how a farm's financial management is run and also learn about fertilizer applications used in the U.S.

McLean discussed current Australian farming conditions.

The Australian government and economists are stressing cash flow budgeting, but it hasn't been accepted by the average farm family, McLean said. Farmers are not accepting cash flow budgeting because of the unreliability of Australian farming. A farmer might make an income and the next year a drought will come and the farmer might not even get his combine out that year, McLean said.

"There is very little government assistance in Australia either in national disasters or market fluctuations. It's very much free enterprise," McLean said. For these reasons, Australian families are very conservative in money management.

"The farmers traditionally tend to stack up money and pay the debts out of this money and see what's left. In the modern world the government claims, with good justifications, that's not acceptable and I agree with the government. The farmers could improve a lot in that area," McLean said.

FARMERS are reluctant to borrow because they can remember during the depression the farmers who succeeded weren't the ones that had big borrowings and were running on business loans, but the fellow who had money in the bank and was running it on conservative money management, McLean said.

When farmers want to increase their farming they don't become more intensive with their land, but purchase more land. Before buying land, the farmer wants to have at least one-half the cost of the land in cash, McLean said.

"Very few people practicing farming in Australia have a tertiary education, unlike the U.S.," McLean said. In Australia, children have seven years of primary school, five years of secondary school, and additional schooling is tertiary.

"The reason that farmers don't have agriculture tertiary educations is because these courses are designed for someone that will be an agriculture advisor or consultant. They haven't established courses for farmers," McLean said.

THE AUSTRALIAN government and Department of Agriculture in recent years have acknowledged that technical services have been successful, but their economic and marketing advice is not up to the standards of their technical advice. These are presently being upgraded, McLean said.

The backbone of the farming industry in Australia is wool. They raise Merino sheep derived from a breed 150 years ago and used primarily for their wool.

"A lucrative outlet for Merino sheep after their good wool-bearing years are up, which is six to seven years, is the selling of the sheep to the Middle East. The people in the Middle East, of Islamic religion, use these sheep as a part of the religious rituals," McLean said.

McLean will be staying in Kansas about a month and a half. During this time he will stay with farm families in Junction City, Elk City, Plevna and Agra. On Aug. 3 to 5, McLean will return to Manhattan to attend the IFYE Blast. In August, McLean will be in Pennsylvania, his second host state.

Kansas women plan meeting

A gathering of Kansas women of all ages, incomes, races and religions, the Kansas Women's Weekend, will be July 15, 16 and 17 in Wichita.

According to Margaret Nordin, member of the coordinating committee, the weekend is the result of Public Law 94-167, a bill which appropriated funds to each state for conventions that will discuss and adopt recommendations to be presented to the President, Congress, and the public. The goal of the meeting is to look at the status of women and press for changes in policies that obstruct women's equality.

The weekend meeting offers workshops on employment, health and parenting.

A special workshop entitled "After Widowhood?" facilitated by Lynn Caine, author of the best-seller, "Widow," will be on Friday afternoon, July 15.

Twenty delegates to a national convention will be elected by those attending the weekend. These delegates will take the resolutions adopted by Kansas women to the national convention, which will be November 18 to 21 in Texas.

A registration fee of two dollars qualifies any Kansas resident over 16 or any Kansas college student to attend and vote at official sessions.

Keynote speaker for the weekend is congressman Martha Keys.

More information can be obtained at Holtz Hall or the Kansas Women's Outreach Programs office.

Program exposes students to university life, situations

By STEVE CARTER
Collegian Reporter

The Upward Bound Program (UBP) is a federal government sponsored program that gives economically disadvantaged students a chance to experience university life.

UBP at K-State has 65 high school students participating in the program coming from high schools in Junction City, St. George, Westmoreland and Manhattan.

In 1966, Upward Bound programs, supported by the Office of Economic Opportunity, were started on a national basis. In the first year, 215 institutions participated in the program. The institutions are located in 50 states, the Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico and Guam. The program has served over 26,000 students since 1966, most of whom had completed grades 10 and 11.

UBP operates on a year-round basis. During the school year, students must meet once a week with teachers in their high schools for tutoring sessions and cultural enrichment programs.

THE ACADEMIC program involves basic math, english, speech and communication skills. These are areas in which pre-tested participants showed they needed the most assistance.

During the summer months students live on college campuses in university housing. The students at K-State stay in Ford Hall.

"I like staying in the dorm because you get more experience if you want to go to college. You learn how to associate and get along with different types of people," said Debra Homes, senior at Manhattan High School.

"We've had pretty good cross-cultural groups. We've been able to maintain this over the last three or four years," said Tom Lassiter, UBP director.

"What we feel is a part of education in this country has to do with dealing with people," Lassiter said. "I feel this is one of the most enriching aspects of the program."

"UBP helps prepare them for some academic experience beyond high school whether it be college, vocational technical school, business school or whatever," Lassiter said.

THE SUMMER program is divided into two groups, bridge students and non-bridge students. Bridge students are seniors in high school getting ready to graduate. UBP helps students by administering the ACT test, providing financial aid counseling, career counseling and the chance to earn six hours of college credit.

The bridge students enroll in the regular K-State summer school program. This summer the six credit hours offered are English Composition and Introduction to Human Development.

The non-bridge students are sophomores and juniors in high school.

The K-State UBP has been operating under Lassiter for four years. Until this year, the program was able to offer the non-bridge students who were behind in high school class credits a chance to make up some hours during the summer. However, this year Manhattan School District No. 383 is offering summer school, so UBP encouraged students to attend summer school in the district.

THIS SUMMER, the K-State faculty has implemented a mini-city program.

This mini-city will have a city commission which is formed by the students through an election. The rest of the students form into groups of five and represent the different sections of a city such as the business district, the urban areas and the suburban areas. The city commission then works with these different sectors of the city in deciding how to deal with a community problem.

During UBP's first year, Lassiter ran an extensive recruiting program to inform high school students of the program. Enthusiasm for it was so great students how become aware of the program through "word of mouth" from former UBP participants. There is currently a waiting list of students wanting to enroll.

The students must stay on campus in the evening. They are given an ID card and can use all the campus recreational facilities. At the end of each program, the students are given post-tests identical to their pre-tests, to measure the results of the academic program.

Mike Finamore was told he had leukemia. Nine years ago.

When Mike Finamore was thirteen years old, he was told he had leukemia.

At that time, this meant he had five, maybe six months, to live.

But just about then, leukemia research produced some dramatic results:

A special combination of drugs that would kill the leukemia cells in the blood and permit the person to live longer than ever before.

So Mike was treated. And it worked.

He didn't die.

Instead, he became one of the fortunate few to have leukemia and live. And today his weekly treatments enable him to lead a normal life.

In fact, right now he's putting the roof on a house he built himself.

And when it's finished there will be a double celebration.

The new house. And Mike's 22nd birthday.

Indian leader, Carter achieve understanding

NEW DELHI, India (AP) — Prime Minister Morarji Desai of India said Monday that in a secret exchange of letters he and President Carter have achieved understanding on a wide range of world issues.

Desai also said in a Fourth of July interview with The Associated Press that the United States, as the world's most powerful nation, has both a privilege and a duty to push disarmament.

Confirming a long-rumored exchange of at least two letters with Carter, Desai said: "From what he says, he (Carter) believes in the same values that I believe in."

The 81-year-old Indian leader addresses Indian audiences almost daily on such topics as democracy, personal freedom, dignity of the common man and the nonviolent ideals of Mohandas K. Gandhi, the father of Indian independence.

"I am sure that the President of the United States, Mr. Carter, will move in this direction of greater understanding and attention to such Indian and Third World problems as poverty, food and capital shortages," Desai said. "Ultimately, it is our own task, but I am sure you will help us."

THE CARTER-DESAI letter exchange started shortly after the world's two largest democracies installed new governments this year.

Details have never been made public but informants from both sides say they have covered sweeping problems such as the gap between rich and poor countries, nuclear safeguards and peace through disarmament.

Desai voiced "my conviction that the friendly relations between our two countries will grow in the years ahead."

Speaking in a near-whisper at his office in Parliament, he told of his expectations from the United States. "I hope the U.S.A. will play a full role in the question of establishing peace in the world by disarmament. It is a difficult task, but it is only difficult tasks that are worth doing."

"Being the most powerful nation, it becomes your privilege, and duty also to do this."

ASKED WHETHER he would make such an appeal to the other nuclear superpowers, Desai replied, "I am making an appeal to all of them. . . Unless the superpowers agree to that, I'll go on trying to persuade them."

Desai's predecessor as prime minister, Indira Gandhi, often spoke of a special Indian relationship with the Soviet Union. Since taking office three and one half months ago, Desai has ended the tilt toward Moscow and declared himself for total nonalignment.

Desai took issue with those who argue that multiparty democracy is a luxury ill-afforded by underdeveloped Third World countries.

"I don't think that human society can ever develop to its full height without freedom."

ABC recreates Kennedy assassination

DALLAS (AP) — For a few seconds, "Lee Harvey Oswald" leaned out a window of the Texas Schoolbook Depository Building.

The sight of actor John Pleshette, a high-powered rifle cradled in his shoulder, attracted the attention of hundreds of tourists who came to Dealey Plaza on Monday to watch the recreation of the Nov. 22, 1963, assassination of President John F. Kennedy.

The recreation is part of an ABC television movie, "The Trial of Lee Harvey Oswald," a fictional tale of what might have happened had the man identified by the Warren Commission as Kennedy's sole assassin lived to stand trial. Oswald was shot to death by Dallas nightclub operator Jack Ruby two days after the assassination while he was being removed from the police department to the county jail.

On Sunday, the recreation of the shooting took place before hundreds of tourists. A cast of several hundred extras scattered and "panicked" as the shots were "fired" into the presidential motorcade.

Maevs Chapman of nearby Irving, one of the spectators, said "When I saw the way she (Christine Rose, the actress playing Mrs. Kennedy) was dressed, and the President bareheaded, it gave you a stranger feeling. It brought tears."

Some spectators pointed out that the movie makers were not very accurate in the description of the event, but Schiller said "We're here to recreate it emotionally... We should not allow the enormity of the event to overshadow the simplicity of the act."

THE PARTY'S OVER.

All too often, when the party ends, the trouble begins.

People who shouldn't be doing anything more active than going to sleep are driving a car. Speeding and weaving their way to death.

Before any of your friends drive home from your party, make sure they aren't drunk.

Don't be fooled because they drank only beer or wine. Beer and wine can be just as intoxicating as mixed drinks.

And don't kid yourself because they may have had some black coffee. Black coffee can't sober them up well enough to drive.

FRIENDS DON'T LET FRIENDS DRIVE DRUNK.

If someone gets too drunk to drive, drive him yourself. Or call a cab. Or offer to let him sleep over.

Maybe your friend won't be feeling so good on the morning after, but you're going to feel terrific.

Brezhnev virtually rules out early U.S.-Soviet summit talks

By the Associated Press
President Carter was said Tuesday to feel that Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev has virtually ruled out an early summit meeting because Brezhnev wants to meet with Carter only if some new U.S.-Soviet pact requires their signatures.

Carter has said publicly he would be willing to meet with Brezhnev just to get acquainted, without insisting on prior completion of negotiations on new strategic arms curbs or any other accord.

White House press secretary Jody Powell said Tuesday that Brezhnev has responded to a letter Carter sent him last month which apparently dealt with a possible American-Soviet summit later this year.

Brezhnev was understood to have written Carter that he would prefer to delay a summit until subordinate officials, such as Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko, have worked out details of a new agreement that Carter and Brezhnev could ratify.

The U.S. President was said to doubt that Brezhnev's attitude was prompted by the state of the Soviet leader's health. It was understood that Malcolm Toon, the U.S. ambassador in Moscow, has reported to Carter that Brezhnev appears to be in vigorous good health.

Brezhnev told Toon Tuesday that some aspects of U.S. policy toward the Soviet Union "do not accord with the aim of a constructive development of relations," the official Tass news agency reported.

Brezhnev met with Toon the day after Soviet television refused to broadcast the ambassador's traditional July 4 message to the Russians. American officials said the Soviets objected to a passage on human rights in Toon's text.

U.S. officials did not say whether the incident was discussed. They noted that Toon had requested the meeting several months ago.

Toon had planned to tell Russians, "Americans will continue to state publicly their belief in human rights and their hope that violations of these rights wherever they may occur will end."

Some details of the Carter-Brezhnev exchange, plus the American President's views and attitudes on a variety of subjects, were conveyed to a group of reporters under ground rules that barred public identification of the source.

Asked why he had set those ground rules, the source deferred to his press spokesman, who said he would not change the rules.

Among questions that would have to be negotiated prior to the conclusion of any new strategic arms limitation treaty with the Soviets are ones dealing with the treatment of nuclear-tipped cruise missiles that would be fired from a launching platform, such as aircraft, positioned miles away from ultimate targets.

Carter to propose gas rationing plan

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Carter is going to ask Congress to approve a comprehensive gasoline rationing plan that he could invoke in any energy emergency, administration sources said Tuesday.

These sources said Carter envisions a consumption cutback of at least 25 per cent should rationing be imposed because of a development such as the 1973 Arab oil embargo.

Under present law, the President has limited standby rationing authority. The sources said Carter wants Congress to remove restraints now in the law so he could declare an emergency and impose rationing without delay.

The sources said examples of developments that might prompt rationing were a new embargo or war in the Middle East or elsewhere that could disrupt tanker shipments to this country.

U.S. seaman held for slayings

Hijacker undergoes testing

NEW YORK (AP) — A 26-year-old U.S. Navy seaman was held without bail for mental tests Tuesday in the slaying of two hostages aboard an interstate bus that was hijacked from the Bronx to Kennedy Airport with 25 passengers aboard.

Police said the victims, passenger Nettie Blassberg and bus driver Norman Bozick, were fatally shot as the hijacker reacted violently to another woman passenger's attempt to subdue him with a karate chop.

Robinson, a black Panamanian native in this country as a resident alien for 14 years, appeared in state Supreme Court in Queens, charged with murder, kidnapping and possession of the .45 caliber death weapon and a four-inch knife.

Queens Dist. Atty. John Santucci said a grand jury also will be asked to indict Robinson in the attempted murder of two other passengers wounded during Monday's nine-hour drama that snarled Independence Day travel plans for an estimated 15,000 people.

Robinson, who was hand-cuffed during a brief appearance before Justice Max Galfant, mumbled in response to reporters' questions. His only audible comment was, "I wish I wasn't standing here."

Meanwhile, authorities were trying to pinpoint the factors that triggered the takeover of the 47-foot bus Monday with a demand for a $6 million ransom, plus a plane to fly Robinson to Cuba.

One of the wounded men, McGovern, told reporters, "He was racially upset, very upset about the racial situation in the United States. He talked about how badly he had been treated in the United States and wanted to leave."

Robinson boarded the Vermont Transit Lines bus Monday afternoon in Manhattan, heading back to his ship, the USS Detroit, in Bath, Maine.

As the bus traveled through the Bronx, the hijacker bolted from his seat, fired a bullet through McGovern's neck to intimidate the others, and ordered the other driver to go to Kennedy Airport. There the bus smashed through a wire fence and roared onto the busy runway complex.

Kennedy was closed twice — once with the original violation of airport limits and again in mid-evening when the kidnapper ordered the bus into motion again.

Negotiations with the gunman fell through and Bruce DeBoer, 17, East Hartford, Conn., whom the gunman conscripted to drive, became confused and the vehicle was cornered near National Airlines Hangar 6. There two armored police cars rammed the disabled bus.

Shortly afterward, the hostages began leaving the bus, and the hijacker threw out his gun and joined the exodus.

Retirement center gets tentative approval

The Manhattan City Commission Tuesday night gave tentative approval for the development of a retirement center to be located south of K-18 and northwest of Allison Ave.

The center, to be built by Carefree, Inc. of Wichita, will be built in two phases, with phase one scheduled for completion in 1979 and phase two to be completed in 1982.

Phase one will include a 78-unit, six story center with one and two bedroom apartments. The center will also have a kitchen, dining room, exercise room and a penthouse on the sixth floor.

Phase two will include the construction of 34 town houses with one and two bedroom units.

JOHN CONDERMAN, speaking for Carefree, Inc. stressed the retirement center will not be a nursing home, but rather a retirement center for the elderly. A nurse will be on call 24 hours, but the center will not be a licensed medical center.

Carefree, Inc. is also the owner of the College Hill Nursing Center. In other commission action, the board gave tentative approval for a rate increase for Manhattan Cable Television.

The commission approved an increase of 55 cents per month on the service charge. Final approval is expected at next week's meeting.

The board also indicated that it will consider a request to de-regulate its control over cable television. This request is expected to be acted upon in August.

Administrators differ over grades

By LAURIE LYNCH
Collegian Reporter

The grading system — the "evaluation of a student's progression through a subject or a class."

Is it a source of pressure placed on students trying to get through school or the fair evaluation it's designed to be? Many more questions probably come to mind when the subject of grades is approached. What purpose do they serve and is there a better way?

"I have no complaints," said Robert Harper, senior in physical education. "If you put effort into a class, you'll get the grade," he said.

"I need the motivation," said one student.

"I don't really like it. It seems kind of like a bunch of bull. Grades don't show what you know, but what you know on a test," said another.

THIS FEELING of a need for motivation not only seems to exist among students, but also among the administration. Any evaluation system for anyone isn't adequate, said Harold Shaver, assistant professor of journalism. "It's the best system we have now," he said. "What students and everyone is looking for is a totally objective system." He said this is impossible because human emotions are involved.

Other administrators agree that the ideal system is impossible to achieve. Ellsworth Gerritz, dean of admissions and records, said he believes the present system is the best that has been tried.

"No one is completely satisfied with any grading system and many different types of evaluation have been attempted," Gerritz said. "However, none has stood the test of time as well as the A B C system as it continues to be used most extensively.

"A student deserves to know where he stands. It can serve as a pat on the back or a kick in the pants," he said.

Earl Nolting, dean of students, also said he believes feedback is necessary.

FEEDBACK HELPS the student and the professor, Nolting said.

"It's important to find some way to measure what's being learned and to reflect this in some way," he said.

Kenneth Lewallen, instructor of Black American History, said he believes the best system is a one-to-one relationship and personal observations. Personal observations, however, are too cumbersome so the system has boiled down to using the more convenient letter grade system, Lewallen said.

"Grades are characteristic of the competitive society we live in, the push to succeed. The way to the middle class is success in school. This success is achieved through brute competition," he said.

HE IS NOT satisfied, but it's a fact of modern American education, said William Brondell, assistant professor of English, who believes grades are not an adequate reflection of what a student knows, but are "better than nothing.

"I very seldom think of alternatives in a situation such as this, because I guess grades are a necessary burden for the faculty and the students," Brondell said.

He said the ideal situation would be to have the student come back after twenty years of living as a human being and explain how good a human being he is.

"Then we could assign a grade to how well he's learned our subject matter," he said. According to Brondell, students know more than they can show on a test, so grades aren't a reliable indication of what they know.

Jordan Utsey, dean of the College of Education, called the letter grade system an imperfect system, but not a bad system.

"I don't suppose there is a perfect system," he said.

THE REFLECTION of progress is subjective to the individual awarding the grades, Utsey said.

A better system might be to reflect smaller categories which would perhaps create a narrower and more accurate system, he said. Society thinks it knows what A B C means and to change the system would be to tamper with history, he said. Utsey said he had no suitable alternative because all are subject to the same kinds of flaws.

"I have no objections to the A B C system," said Robert Coon, head of the Department of Modern Languages. Enforcement is what matters, he said.

"Any old system will work," Coon said. "A university-wide system of no grades is idealistic and impractical."

THE SYSTEM doesn't matter, it's the way the faculty and students view it that matters, Coon said.

"It seems to me there must be a middle ground that we could develop an academic system, not too severe and not too lenient, to give a student an idea of his performance," Coon said.

Robert Lynn, dean of the College of Business Administration, said grades reflect a student's progress.

"Generally speaking, I am satisfied with the system," he said.

Some type of competency skills testing and grading would further develop the grading system, said Jean Reehling, assistant dean of the College of Home Economics.

"They're probably the best tool that we have for assessing the student's ability," she said.

Superstitions persist in today's society

By LAURIE LYNCH
Collegian Reporter

Step on a crack, you'll break your mother's back. Friday the 13th is unlucky. Turn around if a black cat crosses your path.

Superstitions. Silly, right? Then why do many apparently well-educated, rational people react to them?

According to Robert Linder, professor of history, people react to superstitions "because they instinctively know there are strange things that happen in this world."

"It's an irrational way of looking at the world," he said.

The word superstition carries a connotation that causes many to be interested and fascinated by what are believed to be superstitions, said William Koch, associate professor of English and a professional folklorist.

"What is superstition to one person may not be to another," Koch said.

BECAUSE OF this, it's hard to say what's superstition and what isn't, he said.

For example, he said, a farmer may say because there are heavy shucks on the corn, there will be a hard winter. To him this isn't superstition, although to another it may appear to be.

According to a book on superstition, "Strange Stories, Amazing Facts," most superstitions cannot be overcome by logic.

"In many cases it is a survival from those primitive religions in which man worshipped the wild elements in the pious hope that they might help him in his struggle for survival," the authors said.

Long ago, superstition dominated almost every aspect of life.

THE KNIFE had many superstitious connections. Because it is made of iron, it was thought to be protection against many evils. Also, if two knives are crossed on a table, an argument was indicated unless a second person uncrossed them.

Bread also carried superstitious beliefs. It was believed that if the bread didn't rise in the oven, the devil was in it. Because of this, a cross was cut in the top of the loaf to help the bread rise and to let the devil out.

A common superstition is that one doesn't walk under a ladder because a tool or paint might fall. There is an explanation. Anyone walking between the ladder and the wall is supposedly breaking the triangle — the early Christian symbol for the trinity.

MANY HOLD superstitious beliefs, but hesitate to admit it.

"I absolutely refuse to cross a black cat's path. I run around immediately and find a different route," one student said.

"You're not supposed to whistle in the house. It calls mice. I never whistle in the house," another student said.

Why people react to tables or knives as if they had magical power still remains a mystery. But because the reason hasn't been discovered doesn't mean people will forget their superstitions.

"They're like stereotypes," Linder said. "Behind every stereotype there is some truth. That's the way with superstitions."

Rec facilities to be closed temporarily

The Ahearn gym, pools, fieldhouse and weight room will be closed during the month of August until fall classes begin on Aug. 29.

This is to allow for painting of the men's locker room and downstairs area, application of a non-slick floor surface in the halls, locker rooms, weight room and pools, re-surfacing of one of the tartan courts in the fieldhouse and possibly draining and re-painting of the pools.

RIVERSIDE, Calif. — Two homosexuals charged in the "trash bag" murders of two young men and possibly involved in as many as 26 other slayings were arraigned Tuesday on two counts of murder each.

A preliminary hearing for Patrick Kearney and David Hill, ex-roommates from Redondo Beach, Calif., was scheduled for July 15.

The Municipal Court arraignment came after Kearney led investigators from five Southern California counties to shallow gravesites in Imperial County on Monday. Kearney, 37, was "pretty calm" during the five-hour desert trek, said Imperial County sheriff's Sgt. Lon Hettinger.

Police said a total of eight bodies have been found so far, dating to 1967, and the men told them about an additional 33. However, police said they doubted more than 28 murders had been committed.

KANSAS CITY — Teen-age pregnancy in Kansas City has soared in recent years to a point well above the national average, according to a report Tuesday by a special Jackson County Medical Society task force.

The task force said the United States has one of the highest birth rates among teen-agers in the world — 58 births for every 1,000 females in the 15 to 19-year-old age bracket — but a one-year study found that 81 out of every 1,000 teen-age girls in Kansas City give birth each year.

The task force noted that the Kansas City figures are even higher than Bulgaria, which reports the highest proportion of teen-age births in any nation, 72 of every 1,000 teen-age females.

Estimates of the Kansas City Health Department of the number of abortions among teen-agers would increase the pregnancy rate to about one in every 10 teen-age girls. The report concluded that Kansas City has a teen-age pregnancy problem great enough to warrant immediate government attention.

LIMA, Peru — Four men and a woman hijacked a Chilean jetliner on a domestic flight with 55 other persons aboard Tuesday, forced it to Lima's international airport and then surrendered to authorities after a three-hour stand-off, airport sources said.

The sources said the Peruvian government apparently arranged with the Venezuelan embassy to give the hijackers temporary asylum.

Four cars from the embassy pulled up to the aircraft after the surrender. The hijackers were hustled from the jet into the cars and driven off.

VATICAN CITY — The Vatican called for government financial aid for the world's Roman Catholic schools for the first time on Tuesday and warned against the operation of parochial schools catering to the rich, even if lack of public financing is the reason.

Almost 30 million children attend primary and secondary Catholic schools in the world, according to Vatican statistics. U.S. bishops estimate that 8.6 million pupils attend Catholic schools in the United States, but that 6.6 million Catholic children, more than twice as many as a decade ago, do not attend parochial schools.

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — The Pakistan army, seizing power in an apparently bloodless coup, imposed martial law Tuesday and promised new elections next October.

"The Bhutto regime is ended," army chief of staff Gen. Muhammad Ziaul Haq said in a nationwide broadcast after the army acted in an effort to end four months of political violence that took more than 300 lives.

African leaders will support Soviet-backed Patriotic Front

LIBERVILLE, Gabon (AP) — African leaders concluded their 14th annual summit meeting Tuesday with a strong endorsement of the Soviet-backed Patriotic Front as the sole legitimate black nationalist movement seeking to end white minority rule in Rhodesia.

The decision, which has important implications for the future of the black guerrilla war in Rhodesia, was made by consensus at the last working session of the four-day summit of the Organization of African Unity (OAU).

The leader of a rival Rhodesian nationalist group immediately denounced the OAU move, saying it "now makes it impossible for Zimbabwe to unite." Zimbabwe is the nationalists' name for Rhodesia.

THE APPROVED resolution calls on the OAU's 49 member states to extend military, political and diplomatic backing only to the Patriotic Front among the various factions trying to unseat the white Rhodesian government.

The resolution was the most important decision taken at the OAU summit and was seen as a setback for the moderate, Western-oriented leaders who dominated most of the meeting with a 3-2 majority.

Zambia's President Kenneth Kaunda, usually regarded as a moderate, swung the balance in favor of the Patriotic Front, which is led by Joshua Nkomo and Robert Mugabe.

SPEAKING ON behalf of the five frontline states most involved in aiding the Rhodesian nationalists — Zambia, Tanzania, Botswana, Angola and Mozambique — Kaunda warned the summit that any further OAU hesitation over endorsing the Patriotic Front could plunge a black-ruled Rhodesia into civil war.

Delegation sources said Kaunda won over a number of moderates with the assurance that the front would not impose one-party rule on a future black-ruled Rhodesia but would hold free elections if Prime Minister Ian Smith's white regime is ousted.

Nkomo and Mugabe control most of the Rhodesian guerrilla forces, based in Mozambique and Zambia.

Manhattan Art Fair set for July 8-9

The second annual Manhattan Art Fair will be held Friday and Saturday, July 8 and 9, at City Park with over 70 artists from six states exhibiting their work for sale and display, according to Donna Rooks, art fair chairman.

The fair, co-sponsored by the Manhattan Recreation Commission and the Manhattan Arts Council, will be held from 10 a.m. to 8 p.m. in the northeast corner of the park. Displays will include oil and acrylic, watercolor, sculpture, photography, weaving, jewelry and graphics.

Angelo Garzio, K-State art professor, who will spend the coming year as a guest professor at Ahmadu Bello University, in Zaria, Nigeria, will be the featured guest.

In conjunction with the Art Fair, there will be two special attractions at Arts in the Park.

Glass Apple will perform at 8 p.m. Friday and Tom Piggot returns to Manhattan with his synthesized music at 8 p.m. Saturday.

OAU strives for solidarity

As Sudan's President Jaafar el Numairi was blasting the Soviet Union's intervention in African affairs at the Organization of African Unity (OAU) meeting in Libreville, Gabon last week, he also called upon the nations of Africa to "show their solidarity against the new invasion which is impeding our march forward."

Numairi's attacks on the Soviet Union were no surprise. The Sudan has recently ousted all Soviet military advisers and several Soviet diplomats.

What is a sad commentary is Numairi's call for solidarity.

AT THIS time, with the countries of Africa just beginning new phases of development, solidarity is needed. But solidarity does not exist.

The East African nations of Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda are continuously seeking petty arguments with each other.

Tanzania has closed its borders to Kenya, with no vehicular traffic allowed across the border. Although the closed borders were intended to increase tourism by instilling nationalism, the maneuver has not been successful and Tanzania is facing ever-declining tourist trade.

Uganda, under the rule of Idi Amin Dada, the notorious headline-seeker, has accused both Kenya and Tanzania of massing troops on Uganda's borders and Amin has several times threatened war against the countries.

Ethiopia, fighting its own civil battle, is squaring off against Somalia, seeking to engulf the tiny new nation of Djibouti because of its port on the Indian Ocean.

ON THE other side of the continent, Zaire still faces a tense situation with Angola. After their skirmish last winter, the two countries still have not achieved a semblance of peace.

These conflicts seem minor compared to the major divisions within the countries of Rhodesia and South Africa.

The OAU, unfortunately, has become little more than a name. The effectiveness of the organization has diminished as the founders of the organization loose power by coup or as they turn their policies inward trying to stabilize their own internal situations.

The OAU could, and should be, an effective organization to promote the unity and solidarity of Africa. Like the Common Market in Europe, a solid front of nations would be beneficial to Africa's trade policies.

Numairi's words perhaps will bring to African leaders a sense of what they should do together for the benefit of all.

2077; a campus odyssey

It's July 4, 2077. A large group is clustered around an excavation just south of Waters Hall. They're unearthing a time capsule buried 100 years ago, containing various K-State artifacts and miscellany.

As the chest is opened, a cassette tape recorder and a Duracell battery present themselves. Lyle Protz, University President, activates the curious machine and a voice, identifying itself as K-State President Duane Acker startles the befuddled 21st century Wildcats.

"Hi there future K-Staters," the machine sputters. "Before you in this chest is a collection of items which we, in 1977, feel will convey to you what it was like to be a Wildcat 100 years ago."

In the background, the listeners make out the nostalgic Wildcat fight song.

"We feel," the tape continues, "that each of these items plays an important role in our lives and will give you valuable insight into what we were REALLY like here in purple pride country once upon a time."

PROTZ, anxious to sift through the relics of a bygone era, removes the recorder and withdraws from the chest a paper canister containing a brown fluid and a round waferlike object.

He is aided by Wendal Prindle, professor of history.

"That," Prindle said, is what they called coffee and a donut. I believe they were dispensed at the Old Union, but were discontinued when coffee became the national monetary unit and donuts were found to be cancerous."

"What do you suppose this is?" Protz asked, holding a flat leather object with stitching on one side.

"We're not exactly sure," Prindle said. "But there is evidence that a group of students would fill that with air and invite students from another school over to hit each other and keep that object from one another."

"I remember," Protz said. "Football, and if I'm right, the students from K-State weren't very good at that, were they?"

"No, they weren't," Prindle said, unfolding a paper card wrapped around a plastic-covered piece of paper.

"What are those," Protz asked. "These are a student identification card and what they called a fee card," Prindle said. "From what my great grandparents tell me, these were vital to the function of a student. Without these, 1977 K-Staters were denied basic human rights, such as going to movies, attending various university functions and using what they called a library."

"I see," Protz said. "What do you suppose this little paper was for," he said, holding up a worn, self-adhesive sticker.

"Oh, those caused quite an uproar around the late 70s," Prindle said, eyeing the document. "They called those parking permits. Without one of those attached to a student's vehicle he had to park about 50 kilometers away from school or risk losing his first-born male child to Security and Traffic."

"That's right, I keep forgetting," students used individual vehicles back then," Protz said.

"Look at this," Prindle said, handing Protz an aluminum cylinder with the letters C-O-O-R-S written on one side.

"Oh, that," Prindle said. "As far as we can determine, containers such as that contained liquids designed to bring their consumers into a euphoric state, presumably so they could forget about parking permits, football games, stale donuts and student identification card problems."

Touching creates fear

Why are Americans so damn afraid of one of the basic elements of human need? Why are we so insensitive that we must flee from an emotional need and render it a sin to practice that need?

Why are we afraid to touch or to be touched?

Touching is very basic. It is an easy way to express your feelings without having to verbalize. It can be a great comfort to someone when they are depressed, upset or need a good cry.

TOUCHING CAN express concern and affection. It can be a hug or just a pat on the back. Touching can be used to emphasize a point.

And yet we as Americans have moved into an age where it is considered an invasion of privacy to touch someone of the same sex.

If someone sees you hugging someone of the same sex, you are likely to be labeled, at the very least, "weird." If you hold hands with a person of the same sex, you are certain to be labeled homosexual.

The United States is one of the few countries where this is true.

In many European countries it is perfectly acceptable to hold hands with a person of the same sex. It only means that you are very good friends.

THERE ARE countries where you greet people with a hug and a kiss. Heaven forbid that you should do so here!

How do you react if someone tries to break the barriers? Do you shrink from their touch? Do you shiver at the thought of someone touching you as a matter of course during a conversation?

Are you afraid of someone finding out you are really a warm human being and not an insensitive robot the American people have set as their ideal?

If we were not so afraid to touch, we might not have the communication gap. Touching is an easy way to express yourself to your friends, parents and children. There is a bumper sticker which asks "Have you hugged your kid today?" Make it a habit to hug your friends today or just reach out and touch them to show that you really do care.

Celebration keeps local police, firemen occupied

The Fourth of July may have been fun for many Manhattan residents, but it was added work for the Riley County Police and Manhattan Fire Departments.

Riley County police reported 16 complaints of fireworks disturbances. The complaints ranged from fireworks being shot at cars to battles among children.

A fireworks stand located in the Wal-Mart parking lot exploded after a firecracker was reportedly thrown into the stand from a passing car.

There were no injuries but the explosion caused over $19,000 in damage.

MANHATTAN FIRE Chief Bill Smith said since July 1, the legal date for the use of fireworks, the fire department has answered 20 calls, with 10 calls answered on Monday. Each fire was attributed to fireworks, he said.

Smith said most fires occurred in grass and wheat stubble and one dwelling fire was the result of fireworks.

"This is the largest influx of calls we've received on the fourth since I've been here," Smith said. "Before the legal date is over on the 5th, we anticipate we will have made thirty calls because of fireworks."

An official at Memorial Hospital said five persons were brought to the hospital with burns suffered from fireworks.

St. Mary's Hospital admitted no fireworks-related injuries but referred them to Memorial Hospital.

K-State professor traces family's Flint Hills roots

Following the popularity of "Roots," there has been a growing interest in genealogy. But for Betsy Bergen, associate professor of family and child development, this interest began long before Alex Haley's publication.

Bergen has recently written a book titled "A Century of Family Living in the Flint Hills," published by Ag Press. The book starts with her grandparents, William and Elizabeth Clark, who were married in 1873 and carries through the nation's bicentennial year. This idea for the book came from her son who was studying the family tree.

"When I started I was looking not only for family information, but also for more professional things such as birth and death rates, divorce rates, family size and levels of education," she said.

Bergen spent nearly two years visiting everyone in the family, collecting and taking pictures and assembling information.

The book is written in anecdotal style and Bergen said she hopes she has captured the essence of a century of living in Kansas for one family where all but one of the children remained for life and where all 36 grandchildren were born.

Large buildings may utilize solar energy in the future

WASHINGTON (AP) — If electricity prices continue to rise, solar energy may be the cheapest way to provide heat and hot water in large buildings within three years, a congressional study concluded Tuesday.

The report also predicted that private homes, office or apartment buildings and shopping centers all may turn to heat and light from the sun for large parts of their energy requirements in the future.

But most buildings probably cannot get by on solar energy alone; they still would require part of their energy from large central power plants or from "backup" heating systems powered by electricity or natural gas.

And solar energy will not make a dent for at least 20 years in industries that can burn coal, the study by Congress' Office of Technology Assessment also concluded.

The report suggested that government policies should give a bigger push to the improvement and application of small solar energy units serving individual homes or large buildings.

The benefits would include a cleaner environment and increased employment through construction of solar units.

The main problem, it said, is not the unpredictability of sunshine or the need for far-out scientific breakthroughs, but the cost of solar energy compared to the conventional sources: natural gas, coal, and central power plant electricity.

In some parts of the United States, solar heating already can compete economically with electric heating, the study said.

Overseas, it added, some countries with high conventional energy costs offer a potentially large market for existing solar technology.

Men seek stylish haircuts; prefer beauticians to barbers

By TOM FAULKNER
Collegian Reporter

Times have changed, as far as having a men's haircut is concerned. Beauty salons, once catering exclusively to women, are finding men leaving barber shops in search of something extra.

According to Rick McClanahan, owner of Rick and Friends, haircutting is now a way of dress.

"There is a lot more to cutting hair," McClanahan said. "It is just like clothing, it must be designed to fit you."

"In my shop it is a chemical process," he said. "You have to estimate the length and then explain what you can do with the hair to the person. We don't shave faces, and we're not into military haircuts. This is my life and I work at it."

McCLANAHAN said he cuts the hair of seven men a day, each requesting varied styles.

"You learn how to work with the head of the individual, the hair must be shaped correctly otherwise the style will not turn out right," he said.

Crimpers average 20 to 25 men's cuts a day during the school year, with each stylist having two or three customers.

"Men feel more comfortable here, the decor is different than the regular tiled floor in a barber shop," said Brenda Peterson, Crimpers beautician. "We will show a customer styles from style books and then if he still does not find something suitable we will do what we want to. Men are more vain when it comes to how they look."

Peterson said she doesn't concentrate on cutting only men's hair, but finds it more enjoyable to work with both male and female clients.

Crums Beauty School serves 25 to 30 men on a busy day, according to Jeanette Vathauer of Crums.

Vathauer said she finds barber shops fine, but believes they are becoming outdated.

"In a beauty salon men prefer a precision cut," Vathauer said. "At times if the customer doesn't have a style in mind, we will go ahead and cut the hair, but in most cases we won't cut it unless the man agrees with the style."

Lyrics, humor carry 10cc around the bends

By JIM CHALFANT
Collegian Reporter

It's always interesting to try and guess where a group's musical influences lie. In today's music, there are probably more groups influenced by the Beatles than anyone else.

Beatle-imitation became popular when the band broke up. Badfinger and the Raspberries were two popular bands who cashed in on the Beatles style. The trend continued with groups such as Electric Light Orchestra and finally resulted in Klaatu, whom many people even believed to be the Beatles.

10cc are probably the leaders when it comes to borrowing from the Beatles. They have the same slick production, a wide variation in instruments and a vocalist who can sound more like Paul McCartney than McCartney can.

AT THE SAME time, they have always taken care to maintain their own special style and personality, something groups like Badfinger rarely did. You can always tell the difference between 10cc and the Beatles, but at the same time, 10cc carries on many techniques the Beatles used.

Their latest album, "Deceptive Bends," is a fine follow-up to their delightful "How Dare You!" Although two members of the band have departed since that album, you won't notice any difference unless you read the album cover.

10cc has done what is most important in keeping imitation from becoming boring — they've made their songs imaginative. Most of them feature fine harmonies and arrangements and excellent lyrics. The group's outlook is similar to that of Dr.

Hook during their slow ballads with tongue-in-cheek satire, but their up-tempo numbers will remind you more of Frank Zappa. Either way, it's really nice to hear a group with a good sense of humor.

EVERYONE HAS probably heard "The Things We Do For Love" and "People in Love." These are the obvious hits on Deceptive Bends with nice tunes and catchy lyrics. No one else can record a corny love song as well.

The group combines their off-beat, slightly cynical sense of humor with some fine music throughout the album. Eric Stewart and Graham Gouldman are both competent on several instruments and they move from different musical styles with ease.

Besides the slow ballads, there's rock, in "Good Morning Judge." It's the story of the joys of cell-life. Who can dislike lyrics like that—"Alcatraz is like a home sweet home, I'm so wanted and I'm never alone?"

"Modern Man Blues" is probably the best cut on the album, and a unique blues song. Both Gouldman and Stewart sing well on this song, sharing the lead vocals. This one tells us about a man who is really happy now that his wife has left him.

A COUPLE of the songs on Deceptive Bends sound like filler. "You've Got A Cold" is a great description of a cold, but it's hard to get excited about such a subject.

The topics of most of the songs deal with may seem a little strange, and the lyrics are at times mysterious, but give this album a listen. This isn't the best thing 10cc has done, but they continue to succeed with things most groups don't even try.

10cc is nice to have around when most of what we hear on the radio is so drab. Their music alone is enough to carry the album, but their unique lyrics make Deceptive Bends something special.

"Chase" mirrors college life

By BARBARA RUST
Collegian Reporter

Students can relate to the studies and pressures of college portrayed in "The Paper Chase," which will be shown Thursday at 8 p.m. in the Union Little Theatre.

The movie revolves around Hart (Timothy Bottoms), a first-year law student at Harvard, and a class instructed by the most difficult professor on campus, Kingsfield (John Houseman). Houseman, who won an Academy Award for best supporting actor for his role, portrays the authoritarian professor with such ease the viewer thinks he's been doing it all his life.

BY USING the Socratic method of questions and answers,

Kingsfield cross examines individual students. He says, "You teach yourself the law, but I train your mind." Demands of this teaching method are so much some students get sick after his class.

Bottoms realistically portrays an idealistic student concerned with grades. He consistently tries to enter the upper echelon of the class which volunteers, gets recognition — and better grades. At times he fails and realizes the "trouble with staying in the upper echelon is that you have to work harder to stay in it."

The plot of class, teacher-student and study conflicts is slightly weakened through a romance between Bottoms and Lindsay Wagner, who portrays Susan, Kingsfield's daughter.

HART ADMIRES Kingsfield almost to the point of fascination. He notices pictures of Franklin Roosevelt and Adlai Stevenson in Kingsfield's study and tells Susan, "This is his special room."

Hart also seems fascinated with Harvard Law School itself. He tells Susan "minds are being formed to run the world behind these doors."

The story focuses on Harvard law students almost destroying themselves and their friends through their studying, struggling and striving for the "A" in Kingsfield's contract law class.

THE MOVIE, based on the novel by John Osborn, Jr., shows the psychological problems many students face under extreme pressure. In referring to Kingsfield, Hart says, "He screws around with my life."

One day in class Hart decides to stop being soft and faces Kingsfield, telling him, "You are a son of a bitch, Kingsfield." The viewer then realizes Hart has the courage to stand up and be counted and realizes he will make the grade and become a Harvard Law School graduate. Kingsfield's reply was, "That is the most intelligent thing you have said today, Mr. Hart."

The class struggles are real and could take place on any campus. The Paper Chase, with its fine acting and amusing episodes, is worth seeing just to witness Hart's final victory.

Work begins on Ford's presidential papers

WASHINGTON (AP) — While Richard Nixon's presidential papers lie relatively untouched in legal limbo, a librarian has been named to begin work on making Gerald Ford's papers available to public scrutiny.

William Stewart, assistant director at the Franklin Roosevelt Library in Hyde Park, N.Y., will direct a 14-member staff working to catalog and open the Ford papers to researchers.

Ford donated his papers and other historical materials to the federal government just before leaving office. There are about 20 million pages documenting Ford's life as congressman, vice president and president.

BY CONTRAST, Nixon's presidential papers alone total 42 million pages and there are, in addition, 880 tape reels containing some 5,000 hours of conversation.

The ownership of the Nixon papers has not been determined, but the Supreme Court ruled last week that the government has custody and control. The public won't get to see the papers or hear the tapes, however, until other legal underbrush has been cleared away.

Congress must first approve access regulations drawn up by the General Services Administration. Those regulations then will be subject to challenge by Nixon's lawyers.

NO SUCH problems cloud the Ford papers. He was the first incumbent president to donate his papers. Access to his papers will be subject only to restrictions of national security, personal privacy and possible damage to living persons.

Ford's papers are temporarily stored in a warehouse in Ann Arbor, Mich., pending permanent relocation in a Ford library to be built on the campus of the University of Michigan, his alma mater, with money raised by a fund drive. The papers are expected to become available to the public in about three years when the library has been completed.

A SECOND fund drive is on to build a museum for Ford memorabilia at Grand Rapids, Mich., which he represented while in the House.

Stewart has been with the National Archives, a branch of the General Services Administration, since 1960. The announcement of his selection as head of the Ford papers staff was made by James Rhoads, archivist of the United States.

The Ford Library will bring to seven the numbers of presidential libraries administered by the national archives.

In addition to the Roosevelt Library, these are: Herbert Hoover, West Branch, Iowa; Harry Truman, Independence, Mo.; Dwight D. Eisenhower, Abilene, Kan.; John Kennedy, Waltham, Mass. (temporary); Lyndon Johnson, Austin, Tex.

Newspaper releases photos to judge

WICHITA (AP) — The Eagle-Beacon turned over to a judge and the judge in turn gave to the Sedgwick County district attorney's office Tuesday eight pictures made by a news photographer who accompanied sheriff's officers on a drug raid.

The officers forgot to take a camera and asked Jerry Clark of the Eagle-Beacon to photograph the evidence for them.

David Merritt, Jr., executive editor of the newspapers, said the pictures were supplied because the officers apparently relied on a statement by Clark that there would be no problem even though he also said he would have to get the permission of an editor in order to make the pictures available.

"We honor the commitments of the people who work for us," Merritt said.

THE EXECUTIVE editor also said if there had been time to last Friday to determine the facts the pictures would have been made available then.

"We're not interested in impending justice," Merritt said. He also declared the newspapers still take the position that law enforcement officers have no right to subpoena a newspaper's property at will.

"We are not agents of the police," he said.

DISTRICT ATTY. Vern Miller demanded that all pictures taken by Clark be turned over to him for use as evidence and issued a subpoena requiring Joe Harper, managing editor, to appear in Miller's office last Thursday with them.

Harper and Gerrit Wormhoudt, an attorney for the newspapers, responded to the subpoena but produced only those pictures which were published. To make available unpublished pictures, the newspapers contended, would be to forfeit the constitutional guarantees of a free press, make them evidence gatherers rather than news gatherers and jeopardize their credibility as institutions independent of law enforcement and other government officials.

K-State to sponsor merit scholarships

K-State will become a sponsoring institution in the National Merit Scholarship Program in the 1978-79 academic year.

"The University has pledged to support five new scholarships per year," said Michael Novak, director of Student Financial Assistance.

The awards will be one-half of the student's need determined by a standard formula, but may not be less than $250 or more than $1,500. The merit scholarships will be supplemented by K-State through loans, grants or other financial assistance.

New fungicide may help elm trees

By LISA CARMICHAEL
Collegian Reporter

Since the 1930's, American elm trees have been suffering from a fungus known as Dutch elm disease. While there is no known cure for the disease, there is now hope, offered in the form of a fungicide called Lignasan BLP.

"It (Lignasan) may be the savior of elm trees," said a spokesman for a local exterminating company which treats trees in Manhattan. "Lignasan seems to arrest the disease."

Hugh Thompson, associate professor of Entomology, disagrees.

"If you were asking me if Lignasan is the 'great new hope' for the American elm, it is not," he said. "It inactivates the fungus, but probably doesn't kill it."

LIGNASAN BLP, a product of DuPont Chemicals, is a liquid form of Benlate. Benlate isn't water soluble, which caused problems when trying to treat a tree because it would cake up and plug the projectors. However, it was recently discovered that Benlate could be dissolved in hot diluted acid, and when carefully added to water, it can be easily injected into a tree.

Scientists have been working on a cure for Dutch elm disease since 1935, using the same basic ingredient in their experiments. Lignasan, which has been on the market for more than a year appears to be the most workable treatment available.

"DuPont has a monopoly on the market, but I noticed a new company has a product under a different name and it looks like this could be better," Thompson said.

THE EARLIER trees are treated, the better the chances there are for survival.

"The best way to treat a tree is when less than five per cent shows wilt," Thompson said. "After the tree has been treated, the infected branches should be pruned. This is where local companies fail, they don't prune the trees."

"We recommend pruning before treatment but we don't do it. We usually recommend someone," the local spokesman said.

According to Frontiers of Plant Science, the fungus blocks the cambium layer of the tree, preventing water from reaching the stem and leaves. This causes the leaves to wilt and die. When the leaves are no longer pulling water up the stem, the branch no longer receives water and dies.

WHEN THE water no longer moves up in the vessels, the fungus can move towards the roots more easily. Once the disease has reached the roots, it moves into other functioning vessels and infects other parts of the tree.

Lignasan is injected in the tree close to the ground to reach as much of the tree as possible. Holes are drilled six to eight inches apart around the tree, and tubes are placed in each hole. The tubes are connected to a tank filled with a diluted form of Lignasan, and pressure is used to force this solution into the tree.

After a tree has been treated, the holes are plugged with wooden dowels or tree bark and sealed with "tree paint" which works like merthiolate.

IT'S HARMFUL to drill the holes in the tree, however, and research is being done to see if the chemical could be injected into the roots so it could reach more parts of the tree with less drilling.

"Probably the best way to use Lignasan is as a preventative," Thompson said. "It has a low toxicity tree-wise and doesn't cause too many problems with healthy trees."

Another way to help prevent the spread of Dutch elm disease is to spray the tree for beetles which carry the fungus spores.

Last year only two trees in Manhattan died after being treated with Lignasan. According to the spokesman, these trees were already 30 to 40 per cent "gone" before they received treatment.

Lignasan especially helps trees that have not been infected or have minimal damage.

Referral service finds equipment for farmers

By TOM FAULKNER
Collegian Reporter

Three K-State graduates have opened a business few in the mid-west would ever dreamed of starting; a farm implement referral service.

Tom Mertz and Jim Loyd, both 1975 K-State graduates and Gatz Riddell, a 1977 graduate, are the owners.

"I got the idea when I was trying to find a tractor," Mertz said. "I wanted to find one in the neighborhood of $20,000 and was willing to drive 100 to 200 miles to find it."

Most farmers start looking for implements by going through farm newspapers, Mertz said.

"I would spend 30 minutes a day going through the classified ads," he said. "And the bad thing about it is that the merchandise I was looking for might not even be listed."

"That's when I thought that it would be convenient if I could call and find out what farmers or implement dealers had the model I wanted."

"That's when I decided I would be the place to call," he said.

THE REFERRAL service, reached at 1-800-432-2707, is a time saver for the farmer.

"The farmer loses only a few minutes of his time even if we don't have the implement he needs listed," Mertz said.

"We encourage the farmer to call us back in three days if we don't have the information at that time," he said. "What we do when this happens is we call the dealers that are advertising with us to see if they have that implement on their lot."

Farm implements aren't the only items they have on file. "We even have a six-wheel army truck, irrigation motors, back-hoe diggers, and even motorcycles," Mertz said.

According to Mertz, 80 per cent of the farmers who have called have been referred to a dealer who has what they are looking for.

THE SERVICE opened May 15 and since then 250 to 300 farmers have called. Whatever information the farmer wants is filed in alphabetical order. Once the receptionist finds the implement asked for, a complete description is given to the farmer so he knows exactly who has what, and where it can be found.

"As of now we have calls coming from farmers in Oklahoma, Missouri, Colorado, and Kansas," Mertz said. "Within 90 days we will be exposing each piece of equipment on our files in six states when our new watts line is installed. At that time Iowa will be able to reach us also."

"Farmers can call us and put merchandise on our file, and we charge them $2 for each piece listed per month," Mertz said. "If a dealer calls and lists $50 worth of implements, everything he has for sale will be listed free."

Housing program affects Manhattan

By STEVE CARTER
Collegian Reporter

The Section Eight rent supplement program of existing housing is now in effect in Manhattan after several trial years in larger U.S. cities.

The program is divided into three areas of housing: rehabilitation of existing housing, new construction and utilization of existing housing.

Don Whidden, housing officer of the Manhattan Housing Authority, is interested in utilizing existing housing. "It's an attempt by the government to finance safe and sanitary public housing without building and subsidizing it," Whidden said.

Low income families and persons over the age of 62 are eligible for public housing.

After the housing authority accepts a person or family as eligible for public housing, they are given a certificate of family participation. The housing authority then informs the participants on how to inspect a unit for safety standards, how to avoid discrimination and how to figure utility rates and the amount of rent they must pay.

THE HOUSING authority has price limits they will accept on existing housing: $121 for one unit, $144 for two units, $160 for three units and $177 for four-unit homes. Landlords therefore must be willing to offer some of their housing at less than market value.

Section Eight divides the rent between the prospective renter and the government. The government pays for 75 per cent of the rent, while the renter pays for the other 25 per cent.

After the prospective renter has found a landlord who is willing to participate in the program, a contract is signed. In turn, the landlord signs a contract with the housing authority.

The housing authority can supply the landlord with a model lease devised by the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

The lease protects the landlord as well as the renter. If a tenant moves before the lease is over, the housing authority will pay 80 per cent of the rental on the house for two months.

UTILIZING existing housing will be beneficial in three ways, according to Whidden.

"Low income people won't be identified with low income or public housing, the existing housing stock is preserved and the property will remain on the tax rolls," Whidden said.

Whidden also said he hopes utilizing existing housing will reduce the waiting list for people who are eligible for public housing. Presently a person must wait one to two years before a vacancy is available in Manhattan's existing public housing.

Nuclear plants tighten security

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC) has proposed tightening security to protect commercial nuclear fuel processing plants and uranium and plutonium shipments against sabotage, theft and terrorism.

Regulations published in Tuesday's Federal Register would require sharply increased guard forces for high-grade uranium and plutonium, both in storage and in transit.

They also would impose, for the first time, a requirement that private guards hired by commercial nuclear operators and shippers be certified in good mental health, as well as good physical health.

ALTHOUGH companies handling nuclear materials presumably would not do so knowingly, they could hire a lunatic to guard nuclear materials without violating present NRC standards, a spokesman confirmed.

The proposed new rules also would increase the requirements for nuclear shipment guards to stay in contact with fixed security bases which could summon help if necessary.

The proposed regulations do not apply to nuclear power plants. Instead, the rules would apply to 12 nuclear fuel facilities operated by nine companies licensed by the commission and to three companies licensed for nuclear material transportation.

THE NRC and the U.S. Energy Research and Development Administration, the two agencies created out of the old Atomic Energy Commission in 1975, concluded last year that security measures for civilian nuclear activities needed improvement.

Organized terrorism in recent years has focused new attention on the possibility that nuclear fuels could be stolen and fashioned into nuclear bombs or dispersed in crowded areas to expose people to radiation.

The Natural Resources Defense Council, an environmental group, asked the NRC to tighten security measures on an emergency basis.

Veterinarian treats wounded, wild birds

By LISA SANDMEYER
Collegian Reporter

Kismet stared silently, rocking slowly on his branch, his right pupil dilating and contracting as his left pupil remained in a fixed black circle.

In the next cage, another great horned owl puffed up his feathers as Dan Paretsky, veterinarian at Dykstra Veterinary Hospital, observed.

The owls are two of the many birds brought to Dykstra since last October and put into Paretsky's care. He began working with birds when Howland, a great horned owl, was brought to Dykstra last fall.

Howland was one of several birds of prey, called raptors, that had been shot. Most of the birds that came to Dykstra last fall had lead pellets in them, Paretsky said.

SINCE October, Paretsky has treated several hawks and eagles as well as owls. The initial trauma of injury is complicated by the animals not being used to captivity.

"I don't think I've ever seen a more forlorn looking animal," Paretsky said, describing a juvenile bald eagle he treated. He said depression is a leading cause of death among the animals brought to Dykstra.

Also, if birds are kept in captivity for more than six weeks or so, they must be retrained because they don't have room to exercise their wings while at Dykstra, he said.

Treatment of birds presents its own problems.

"We don't know how they respond to anesthesia exactly," Paretsky said. Also, procedures used to treat larger animals can't be used with birds. For example, a metal plate or pin used to hold a broken bone together makes a bird too heavy to fly, he said.

IN ADDITION to his work with birds, Paretsky also treats the residents of the Sunset Zoo. His operations have included taking an ingrown toenail out of a lion and stitching two jaguars' paws. One of the greatest problems in working with zoo animals is restraint, Paretsky said. When treating a dog or cat, others can hold the animal down. "There's no way you're going to get enough people to hold a jaguar," he said.

A tranquilized animal stays asleep for about 10 minutes so the work must be done quickly, Paretsky said.

A grizzly bear at the zoo became lame and, rather than tranquilizing her to take X-rays, the doctors chose to treat the symptoms and the bear's condition has improved.

Paretsky's appointment at Dykstra ends Sept. 1, but he hasn't decided his future plans.

Injection causes pipeline leak

ANCHORAGE (AP)—The accidental injection of liquid nitrogen at 290 degrees below zero into a section of the trans-Alaska oil pipeline was the cause of a "break of a brutal nature" that has forced a two-day shutdown of the pipeline, officials said Wednesday.

The broken underground section of pipe contained no oil and all that leaked was noncombustible nitrogen gas.

The section of pipe was dug up and a replacement was being welded into place Wednesday, with pumping of the first oil to pass through the line expected to resume by today. The welds had to be examined by X rays before the pumping could resume. Engineers originally had attributed the leak to the failure of a 1½-inch drain plug.

Inert nitrogen gas is moved ahead of the oil to reveal leaks and prevent the possibility of combustion.

A SOURCE in Alyeska Pipeline Service Co. called the introduction of the liquid form of nitrogen "human error." He said no design or material defect was involved, although metallurgical tests will be made of the damaged pipe.

The nitrogen was supposed to enter the pipe in a warmer, gaseous form. In that state, the nitrogen would have adopted the temperature of the pipe.

The oil was stopped about 15 miles north of Pump Station No. 8 after the nitrogen leak was discovered.

Eyes of wisdom

When he was only a few weeks old, Kismet, a Great Horned owl, was dragged from his nest by several dogs and severely injured. Recovered and much older, Kismet will soon return to the wild.

Retirement center will aid community

Manhattan is moving in a favorable direction in establishing retirement facilities for its elderly residents.

The city commission Tuesday approved the development of a southwest Manhattan retirement center and the city planning department is now working with the Manhattan Retirement Foundation to establish a second retirement center in northeast Manhattan.

That the city is showing a genuine concern for its elderly is commendable.

PRESENTLY, the only facilities available to Manhattan's elderly are the high-rise building downtown and the mid-rise building in south Manhattan. Both of these facilities, however, have long waiting lists and income ceilings which close them to much of the city's elderly population.

What is sorely needed, and what seems to be in the cards for Manhattan are facilities which are available to the elderly but which don't remove them from the community.

The center which was tentatively approved Tuesday will do just that. It will provide an apartment building as well as townhouses to the elderly and, while it won't be a nursing home, it will have adequate medical facilities to meet the needs of center residents.

PLANS FOR the Retirement Foundation's center are similar.

Most important, the retirement centers' residents will still play a role in community affairs — a role which, in some communities, is unfortunately denied to them.

In providing moderately-priced housing, the city will allow its elderly to remain self-sufficient, live in above standard housing, and provide direction to city development.

The city should continue to do all it can to accommodate and assist its elderly. The retirement facilities are more than worthwhile, they are essential if Manhattan is to benefit from its most valuable citizens.

KKK; Phase Two

I'm going downtown today. The KKK is having a rally and my presence is required. Come along.

Oh, I forgot. That's the KKK, Phase II. I guess I had better bring you up to date so you won't misunderstand or be alarmed by the goings on.

This is the year 3000 and I live in M.P. Village, Misc. (That's Melting Pot Village in the state of Miscegenation for you kids who are too young to remember the Transformation.)

Since the Transformation, the American people have finally melted into one color after a century of interracial and international marriage and reproduction. Well, almost all of the American people anyway. There is one group of single-race Americans remaining — a small group of 20 white, Anglo-Saxon protestants who are nearing extinction.

THANK GOODNESS they are confined to a reservation in the far reaches of Alaska. I would hate for my children to have to be contaminated by their antiquated ideas of white on white.

Legend has it the whites are the descendants of a group of 20th century WASP's who advocated white supremacy and waged verbal, sometimes physical campaigns against all other colors of people, especially blacks. They have been said to have gone about their tasks with an almost insane passion. The Ku Klux Klan was their name and the fact that their acronym and that of my organization are identical means absolutely nothing.

Legend has it the 20th century KKK's were vigilante-like; murdering non-whites without reason. As the century progressed, however, their ideals began to lose substance due to a growing number of Americans who were no longer so color-conscious and were crossing national and racial lines. Their 22nd century descendants are child-like in comparison, but their very presence reminds new Americans of the pre-Transformation years. The KKK, Phase II is considering a national law to mandate the whites integration into society.

TOWNSQUARE, high noon. The KKK, Phase II is gathering. We number in the millions and Melting Pot Village is overflowing with multi-breeds, the Kool-Kolored Kids. We believe in interracial everything and, through our efforts and determination, have practically erased racism. The more numerous and varied one's bloodlines are, the more socially elite. Mixed people are the supreme race and we shall disseminate our seeds. Our kool kolor will be global by the end of this decade. That is our goal.

Melting Pot Village... the Transformation... I dreamt about those things only to awaken to the rude reality of the Ku Klux Klan. Because of my belief in humanity and my interracial background, I am at a loss to rationalize the philosophy of such a group.

Certainly, this is a free country, but I find the brand of freedom exercised by the KKK to be extremely nauseating. Americans of different colors still have to put up with the verbal and sometimes physical abuse of Klansmen and it is not only they, but also fellow white Americans who find the conceptual and philosophical aspects of the Klan repulsive as evidenced by the recent Plains, Ga. and Columbus, Ohio incidents. The KKK may be alive today, but certainly not well in my conventional interpretation of the word.

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Postmaster General Benjamin Bailar proposed on Wednesday to boost first-class postage rates to 16 cents for businesses but allow individuals to continue paying 13 cents.

Bailar made no recommendations on ending Saturday mail deliveries as a cost-cutting measure but said the idea still is under serious consideration.

He said the dual rate system for first class mail could almost erase the Postal Service's $1 billion a year deficit, making the service close to self-sufficient.

PETAH TIQVA, Israel — A pipe bomb planted under a vegetable stand exploded and ripped through a bustling open-air market in this Tel Aviv suburb Wednesday, injuring 21 persons, five of them seriously, in Israel's worst bombing in 14 months.

The radical guerrilla group Popular Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine claimed responsibility for the attack, saying the bomb was its answer "to Begin's policy of creating new settlements in Palestine."

WASHINGTON — A Social Security computer system containing personal information on millions of Americans is open to fraud and unauthorized disclosure of confidential data, a government report says.

"Security procedures and controls for the system were not adequate to prevent fraud and abuse or to assure compliance with the requirements of the Privacy Act of 1974," said the report by the audit agency of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

Kansans perform in theater company

Grand Lake, Colo., has taken a Kansas flavor this summer.

K-State faculty and students are involved in the Pine Cone Theatre repertory company and in the Rocky Mountain Summer Institute of the Fine Arts.

The venture dates back to the end of 1975 season when a summer repertory company which had been based at Grand Lake left the small mountain community. Warren Rempel, who is associated with United Ministries in Higher Education at K-State and runs a youth hostel at Grand Lake, assumed the responsibility of finding a way for the Coloradoans to set-up a local organization.

Rempel and Joel Climenhaga, associate professor of theater at K-State, presented their plan to community leaders of Grand County. As a result, Climenhaga is now managing producer and business manager for the locally-based company and executive director of the Fine Arts Institute.

Cardwell planetarium draws interest of astronomy buffs

By DIXIE HOLMES
Collegian Reporter

Astronomy as a science elective isn't emphasized at K-State, but should be according to Ted Geisert, graduate in science education and summer operator of the Cardwell planetarium.

"It (astronomy) is something that people can relate to and many people do as a hobby," Geisert said. "It can even be taught without math or lab work."

K-State astronomy courses have access to the planetarium and observatory in Cardwell Hall. Although the observatory isn't very effective because of the lights from the city and University, it can still be used for quite a few observations, Geisert said. It is best for novices not working with deep sky objects that can be seen only from the country.

"You can see more with little telescopes in the country than you can with big ones in the city," Geisert said.

There are special filters that can help correct the light problem, but the best observing is done in a high altitude with dry air and very little light, he said.

GEISERT said he believes many city observatories were built for convenience and aesthetic reasons without fully considering the effects of the lights on observation.

The K-State observatory is utilized by the physics department, but it is no longer emphasized, Geisert said. He would like to see it become an open house observatory and get more use.

"It's a disadvantage we have such an expensive facility on campus but don't use it more," Geisert said. "It does have some problems like vibration but I understand that can be worked out."

Geisert estimated the scope to be worth $20,000 and the dome it is housed in to be worth even more.

The planetarium, a round room with a seating capacity of about 45, has a film projector that projects the stars on the ceiling.

THE MOTIONS of the stars, eclipses, meteor showers and stars patterns in other parts of the world can be demonstrated.

"In a way it's (the planetarium) a theater or a very expensive visual aid," Geisert said. Geisert will be developing programs for the planetarium this fall. He plans to present as many as eight shows a week on a variety of topics.

There are at least five other planetariums in the state. Geisert rated K-State's as average.

He said he believes people are better informed about astronomy now than they were 50 or 60 years ago.

For example, in 1910 when it was predicted the earth would go through the tail of Haley's Comet, there was widespread panic. Many persons believed they would be killed by poisonous gases and people were buying "comet insurance" and "comet pills."

Correction

Ahearn Field House will be closed in August to Recreational Services activities only. All other fieldhouse activities in August will be as scheduled. The Rec Services activities will continue when fall classes begin on Aug. 29.

Placement officers meet at K-State

The Kansas-Nebraska Placement Officers Conference will be at K-State July 11 and 12.

The conferences began at K-State nine years ago under the direction of Bruce Laughlin, director of the K-State Career Planning and Placement Center, and Frank Hallgren, from the University of Nebraska.

"The conference is a 'nuts and bolts' discussion of the situations in our offices," Laughlin said. It will include discussions on how to upgrade placement services and how to make placement offices more efficient.

UFM moves to Straube in the fall

By LISA SANDMEYER
Collegian Reporter

University for Man's (UFM) proposal to lease vacated Straube Scholarship House from the Endowment Association was accepted by Endowment's board of directors Thursday morning. The proposal had been tabled in the board's June 28 meeting.

The proposal allows UFM to rent Straube for $5,000 annually. UFM will be responsible for insurance and upkeep on the building, as well as renovation to bring Straube to building code standards. UFM's original proposal to repair Straube and lease the building for one dollar per year was rejected earlier.

Straube was originally vacated in May due to the cost of repairs necessary to bring the building in compliance with state fire regulations and residence hall standards.

The estimated cost of renovation is between $10,000 and $20,000, according to Joe Rippetoe, UFM business manager. Renovation will begin as soon as possible with a loan from a local financial institution, Rippetoe said.

UFM begins paying rent September 1, and their lease runs for ten years with an option to renew.

"I'm very pleased with the Endowment Association's action," said Terry Matlack, student body president. "It shows they're (Endowment) supportive of student programs."

Moving to Straube will give more space to UFM and the two other social services its building now houses, the Drug Education Center and the FONE Walk-In Crisis Center.

A FUND-RAISING drive will be initiated to pay the loan and other costs of renovation, Rippetoe said.

Major construction work will be done by professionals, and general work, such as painting and plastering, will be done by UFM staff, Rippetoe said. He said UFM hopes to use architecture classes in the renovation.

UFM has been searching for new quarters for several months, Rippetoe said, and has had much help from University officials and its own board of directors.

The move to Straube will give UFM space for growth, as well as off-street parking, not available at the present location at 615 Fairchild Terr. Another advantage to the Straube site is that it would be more accessible to the community.

UFM hopes to have its new facility in operation by November 1, or sooner, if possible, Rippetoe said.

There was some discussion among student senators of the possibility of moving other social services to the Straube site if UFM's proposal was accepted.

Dormitory officials allowed access to student records

By BARBARA RUST
Collegian Reporter

The Buckley Amendment protects the privacy of parents and students — almost.

The amendment assures the confidentiality of K-State students' records unless there is a "legitimate educational need," according to Thomas Frith, director of housing.

If such a need exists, University officials can view student records without students' consent. Dormitory assistants are included in the definition of University officials, Frith said.

"A residence hall director or agent of the director can view students' grades," Frith said. "Resident (R.A.s) and Staff Assistants (S.A.s) are employees of the university because they meet the requirements of the Buckley Amendment."

JOHN O'NEIL, summer S.A. in Ford Hall and Marlatt Hall for fall, said he has looked at students' grades. People come to him for help and he uses the grades to aid in counseling students.

"We check specifically new students to find out which ones are having problems academically," he said. "We can better help them adjust to the University if we know where the problems are."

Staff officials might have difficulty knowing when residents are having grade problems without access to the grades, said Tim Landon, Ford Hall summer director. Landon and O'Neil use the grade information to set up study skills programs.

The Department of Housing gives Holtz Hall a list of authorized people, such as R.A.s and S.A.s. These people present identification and can obtain the grades of any student living on their corridor or floor, O'Neil said.

"The dorm's policy is not necessarily illegal," said Nyles Davis, K-State student attorney.

When a University official sees the grades for a legitimate educational interest, the Buckley Amendment isn't violated, Davis said. "The amendment, however, doesn't define a University official, but leaves the definition to the institution."

K-STATE defines a University official as University personnel, which, in its application, may be too broad, Davis said. Part-time student dormitory assistants are included and, according to Davis, as the University's definition is written any University employee who could verify a legitimate need could obtain a student's records.

"I think they are stretching the Buckley Amendment of University personnel a little too far," said Ron Nelson, president of the K-State chapter of American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU). "Probably 50 per cent of the people who have their grades looked at don't even know it."

ACLU thinks it can do little except inform students, according to Nelson. Few cases have been tried on the Buckley Amendment, producing no precedents. Either an individual or the ACLU might decide to take the case to court, he said.

"To really get a definition (of grades and dormitory staff), it would have to be tested in court," Frith said. "Depending on who would fund the action we would have to take and how much it would cost, as an educator, I would desire to get a court decision."

Manhattan receives grant to renovate sewage plant

By CHRIS WILLIAMS
City Editor

The Manhattan City Commission Thursday night announced Manhattan is the recipient of a grant from the Environmental Protection Agency earmarked for the renovation of the sanitary sewage system in west Manhattan.

The grant is for the design of a new system. City attorney Ed Horne said construction money is usually granted after a review of the designs. The amount of the grant was not disclosed.

The new sewage plan calls for the rebuilding of the Wildcat

Creek pumping station which was determined as insufficient to handle the pumping capacities.

By rebuilding the Wildcat pumping station, the Spencer pumping station will be eliminated.

With the renovation of the system, the go-ahead is apparently ready for the construction of a housing development located north of Kimball and east of Browning streets.

Proposed is the construction of 72 single units and 26 duplexes. The new housing would use the west Manhattan sewage system. There was a fear of overflow on the existing system.

Postage due

Although postage rates may be on the rise and a cutback in mail delivery in the near future has been proposed, these isolated, dilapidated mailboxes wait patiently in eastern Manhattan to serve their daily purpose.

Scouting officials say camps are safe

By DENNIS BOONE
Collegian Reporter

Despite possible ill effects from the recent murder-kidnappings of girl scouts in Locust Grove, Okla., and Sarasota, Fla., area girl scout officials said they believe girl scouts attending camps now are as safe as ever; possibly safer.

According to Kathy Hermes, Manhattan's field director for Riley County Girl Scouts, and Virginia Bridges, executive director of the Kaw Valley Girl Scouts Association, Inc. (KVGSA), the publicity given the two incidents has brought a greater awareness to parents, girls and camp administrators not only in Kansas, but across the nation.

"We have had lots of calls from parents about our security precautions which would indicate a growing concern among parents," Bridges said. "But security is a matter that we have been concerned with for over 50 years that we have been operating."

BRIDGES, who cut her summer vacation short to return to Topeka after hearing of the triple murder in Locust Grove, said there are two kinds of camping institutions, the resident and non-resident. Resident camps are more secure than non-resident camps, she said, citing Locust Grove and Sarasota as examples.

"The Sarasota case involved a camp on state property," she said. "Our resident camps are owned by the Girl Scouts and access to these camps is more in our control, whereas anyone can get onto state grounds."

BECAUSE OF the increase in parental concern, the main branch of KVGSA in Topeka has authorized additional security for its one resident camp, Camp Daisy Hindman, near Topeka.

"Beyond things like our proportion of counselors to girls, sleeping arrangements and bed checks, we have hired additional security personnel to patrol the grounds, with at least one extra man on grounds each night," Bridges said. "And there are three men who live at the campsite. And again, a new communications system was recently installed."

IN TWO other non-resident camps at Tuttle Creek and Milford Reservoir, it has been the responsibility of groups using the facilities to provide their own security.

"We have had tight security for the 50 years we have been in operation," Hermes said. "We feel that our counselors and staff are doing an adequate job in providing security for the girls at the non-resident camps."

The Topeka branch has not only provided additional protection, but has consulted a psychiatrist in an effort to determine the likelihood of similar incidents occurring here.

"The psychiatrist we were in contact with says the publicity given will help in cutting down on such incidents," Bridges said.

"With the media covering this as extensively as it has, he says the publicity will scare off anyone with ideas about breaking into camps, as well as put campers and counselors on the alert."

WHAT EFFECT the murder and kidnapping acts will have on the number of girls attending camps this summer isn't certain.

"There are two different answers to a question like this," Bridges said. "First, the number of girls joining the Girl Scouts will not drop, I'm sure. But as far as the number of girls attending camp this summer, there may be a decline, but in my estimation, it would be of less than five per cent."

Hermes said she foresees no decline in the membership of the Riley County Girl Scout ranks, which number approximately 1,000, some 200 of which are adult counselors.

Parking violations costly, avoidable

By KIM WASHINGTON
Collegian Reporter

Fighting for a parking space on campus has always been a problem for students, but paying the parking tickets can be worse.

Even with limited available parking spaces, students find a place to park, whether it's legal or not, and campus parking violations pile up. Between July 1, 1976 and June 30, 1977, 32,328 tickets were issued.

"Students are not the only ones who receive violations," said Paul Nelson, director of Security and Traffic. "Faculty and staff members also receive them."

"There are ways to keep from receiving violations," he said. "If students would read the Traffic and Parking handbook they'd know where to park and, if they would put the free identification sticker on their cars, it would reduce the price of the fine."

AT THE beginning of each semester, students are allowed two violations — courtesy ticket and a warning ticket, neither requiring payment.

"We (Security Traffic) issue around 1,000 courtesy tickets the first few days of each semester," Nelson said. "Some tickets are made because of negligence on the student's part. Some students have received as much as $700 worth of violations in a year."

"If we didn't give violations, people would park anywhere. There would be no emergency lanes, the streets would be blocked. The campus would come to a halt," he said.

"Something is being done" he said. "The students who live on campus can't park on University property between 7:30 a.m. and 3:30 p.m. and freshmen can't purchase parking permits. Thirty hours of credits are required before permits can be purchased."

Money collected from tickets is deposited in the Traffic Fund and is used for enforcing the parking rules, maintenance and repair of parking facilities, planning, construction and control of pedestrians and motor vehicles on campus.

"When the University built a new parking lot it cost $100,000, so it's not that easy to construct another lot," he said.

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — President Carter is considering a series of options that would let him redeem his campaign pledge to cut the size of the White House staff by 30 per cent.

One option under consideration would reduce his immediate staff to about 340 persons, the smallest presidential entourage since Dwight Eisenhower occupied the White House 20 years ago.

The present White House staff numbers more than 550, including workers borrowed on a temporary basis from federal agencies. The staff at the end of Gerald Ford's presidency was slightly above 500.

Although faced with a variety of choices in considering reorganization of the Executive Office of the President, Carter was reported by administration sources to be likely to scrap the Office of Telecommunications Policy, the Energy Resources Council, the Economic Policy Group and some other executive bodies.

TAIPEI, Taiwan — A Chinese Communist squadron commander carrying secret military documents flew his MIG19 jet fighter to Taiwan on Thursday, a Nationalist Chinese spokesman said. Sources said he would be rewarded with nearly $700,000 in gold.

Fan Yuan-yan, 41, landed safely in Taiwan on the southwest coast of the island after flying across the 100-mile-wide Formosa Strait from Communist China's Fukien Province. The government said he sought political asylum.

Military sources said he brought with him Chinese defense information and documents on coastal military installations. But the MIG19 itself is an outmoded craft that offers little for Western intelligence.

DANBURY, Conn. — The city fire marshal says he believes arson caused a fire that sent toxic fumes through an overcrowded federal prison Thursday, killing five inmates and injuring 66 persons.

Marshal Fred Tomaino said clothing was ignited in a dormitory washroom. "We believe it was set," he said.

Officials said, meanwhile, that a board of inquiry would investigate both the cause of the fire and reports of delays in handling it.

Some prisoners said a door to their cellblock was locked and they had to break it down to escape.

TOPEKA — Gov. Robert Bennett announced Thursday that the Department of the Army has approved moves to complete reorganization of the 69th Infantry Brigade, Kansas Army National Guard, into a mechanized infantry structure.

Bennett said no community will lose armories or units as a result of the reorganization. But he said the mission of some units will change.

Bennett said the final steps follow actions completed in 1976 which resulted in establishment of the 635th Armor Battalion in the Manhattan area and the relocation of the 891st Engineer Battalion, formerly at Manhattan.

KANSAS CITY — Jonathan Adam Howerton was born at St. Lukes Hospital Thursday and weighed seven pounds, seven ounces.

Mrs. John Howerton, 28, said she and her husband talked on the way to the hospital Wednesday night about the rarity of having a baby born on the seventh day of the seventh month of 1977.

"When he weighed seven pounds and seven ounces we nearly freaked out," she said.

"It's got to be lucky. It's just got to be with that combination."

K-State raises fish below Tuttle Creek; conducts research in catfish production

By DIXIE HOLMES
Collegian Reporter

Among other things, K-State raises catfish.

The University owns 28 ponds on a quarter acre of land near the river pond area below the Tuttle Creek dam.

John Kelley, associate professor of biology, supervises research conducted at the ponds for improving methods of fish production.

"It isn't a hatchery," Kelley said. "Our goal is to see how many fish we can produce in the smallest area at the least cost." This translates into technology that can be used by farmers and, in turn, lower prices for consumers, he said.

IN THEIR research, the Division of Biology selectively breeds fish from all over the country. Fish that can utilize lower quality proteins are desirable because they cost less to raise, Kelley said. Researchers at the ponds also offer diet consultation and share findings with farmers and commercial fish growers.

Kelley said he believes fish will someday be an important food in fighting world hunger because they are 92 per cent edible meat, high in protein and can be raised in limited space.

Band sells clocks to buy uniforms

Selling clocks is the latest money-raiser for the K-State Marching Band's uniforms.

The battery-operated wall clocks, purple and gold with a Wildcat on their faces, sell for $500 each. Nine Manhattan businesses, two out-of-town firms and two individuals have purchased them so far.

"The idea is Frank Gatschet's of (Manhattan) Wal-Mart," said Phil Hewett, K-State band director. "I think we've finally come up with something that's going to work." The band, he said, has had many problems trying to raise money for uniforms.

The band's goal is to sell 130 clocks, enough to purchase the new uniforms.

Opinions

Articles appearing on this page do not necessarily represent the entire Collegian staff or the Board of Student Publications.

Are students rights really protected?

Students rights as defined by the Buckley Amendment includes the right of a student to keep his academic record private.

A transcript cannot be issued to a prospective employer without the student's permission. Grades on tests cannot be posted in an area where the grades are visible to the general student population.

However, at K-State, grades are still being posted, and the viewing of grades by persons other than instructors and professors is routinely practiced.

THE staff and resident assistants in K-State dormitories, themselves students, are permitted to view the grades of the students living on their corridors and floors.

Supposedly there is a "legitimate educational need" which allows the SA's and RA's to view the grades.

This privilege extended to residence hall staff is questionable and could easily be misused.

NO DEFINITION exists of what a "legitimate educational need" is. What is to stop a staff assistant from looking up the grades of a student just to satisfy his curiosity? Why does he have the right to view someone's personal grade record?

Staff assistants are supposedly qualified to counsel students and in the course of counseling may feel they need to view a student's grades.

They can look at the grades without notifying the student that his grades will be viewed. Wouldn't it be easier if he simply asked the student about his grades? If asked, many students will answer.

It seems a clear violation, not only of the Buckley Amendment, but also of a student's right to privacy to have residence hall staff view grades.

A very positive selfishness

Two is company, three's a crowd. What, then, is one?

Ours is a "let's get married" society and being single is considered a fleetingly temporary condition of which any prolonged extension raises questions about the individual involved. Society says there is nothing wrong with being single, as long as you are married sometime in your early 20s, especially if you are female.

Other qualifications which are mandated of a healthy, normal American single is to have one lover or be desperately searching for one, not live alone and vehemently dislike the "condition" of being single.

Am I suffering from a fatal disease because I am adamantly single, not thinking about marriage and enjoying this "condition?" I think not and I am certain I don't think alone.

IT IS another live-and-let-live situation in which society always seems to put its rather large foot. It is a societal sin to be a happy single without marital intentions. At this rate, I'll be a spinster in a year.

Tell someone you are single and you receive one or more of the classic labels. There are only three kinds of singles, right? The swinging single, the rejected individual with no place to go and no one to go to or the insane independent who doesn't know what's good for him.

Cara, a fellow 20-year old spinster, told me the first question relatives ask her when she calls or visits is, "Are you engaged yet?" When she says no, it's "When ARE you going to get married, dear?!" And when she tells them she isn't even interested in anyone, the roof falls in. They ask what is wrong and offer advice ranging anywhere from psychological counseling to computer dating. Sigh.

Mid-America U.S.A.

OSAGE CITY — Rural America — It has been stereotyped, laughed at, written about, but throughout American history it has survived.

The backbone of middle America and Kansas, as seen through the eyes of this easterner is still holding on, although shakily at times, to the one thing which has kept it alive — community.

A foreigner to the rural mid-west, brought up with a negative view of this area expects to see certain scenes upon arrival. With the help of America's all-time stereotype promoters, television and the movie industry, the foreigner has conjured up in his mind Wizard of Oz images of old women rocking endlessly on porches of squatty houses, tractors plugging along windy county roads and narrow-minded rednecks attired in feed caps.

RURAL KANSAS and rural America in general many say, is the most boring place one could go. Some say living here is like living life in slow motion.

Well, to each his own I say, and to each his own perverted view of, corny as it sounds, a place where one can learn much about the human condition and also what America is supposed to be about.

In this eastern Kansas "city" (they call them towns where I come from) of 2,700, a foreigner, naive and full of stereotypes, is happy to find out at first glance that all his preconceived notions of this place were not wrong. For many of the so-called rural Americans, down home scenes can be found here. However, they don't have to leave as negative an impression as one thinks they will.

City folks' misconceptions are taken lightly by these people. What are just stereotyped scenes for urbanites are real life situations for them. But the great thing about these people is their contentment with their situation. They wouldn't be living here if they didn't like it.

They have a traditional and solid way of life as natural as the stalks of grain many of them are cultivating. Their city is a neighborhood and community, the way it's supposed to be.

THIS SUPPOSEDLY sophisticated college student laughed to himself when he found a big topic of conversation here to be the county fair in August. How trite and traditional! But this event has been going on for years, and the reason it has is because people get enthused about it and they get together with their neighbors to plan it.

In fact, it is events like this which seem hick to the Johnson Countian that have been instrumental in keeping these people together for years. Yes, it's traditional but it's also a symbol of friendship and community. When people work hard to plan such things, one knows they like this place.

Most people here aren't interested in venturing too far from this hamlet. They like to read the weekly newspaper with its correspondent columns telling who visited who and when the local band concert will be, but I've yet to find a Newsweek or Time on a newstand.

This isn't New York, and thank God because New York and many other big cities in the United States are almost uninhabitable. People live there because that's where the better jobs are. Most people in the country live here because they like it. What makes more sense?

FBI says harsh weather aided sharp drop in crime

WASHINGTON (AP) — The bitter cold and snows of early 1977 may have contributed to the nation's sharpest quarterly decrease in crime in nearly two decades, the FBI said Thursday.

The crime rate for the first three months of 1977 dropped nine per cent below the level for the same period a year ago, the agency said in its quarterly Uniform Crime Report.

The statistics are based on the number of crimes reported to nearly 9,000 state and local law enforcement agencies. The report covers seven crime categories. —

'Hee Haw' band to perform in park

R.W. Blackwood and the Blackwood Rhythm Band, stars of Hee Haw, will appear this Saturday at 8 p.m. at Arts in the Park.

They replace Tom Piggot of Boston, who was scheduled to appear with his synthesizers and electric jazz, but canceled.

Besides appearing on Hee Haw, the Blackwood Band has played on a Dean Martin television special and at over 500 fairs and resorts. The band also has two records currently on the country charts, "Sunday Afternoon Boat Ride" and "Memory Go Round."

Appearing with the Blackwood Band will be a three-year old drummer as well as comedian Judd Pertussi. The Band is sponsored by the Student Governing Association Summer School Artist Series and Arts in the Park.

murder, rape, aggravated assault, robbery, burglary, larceny and motor vehicle theft.

"The harsh winter could have been a major factor in the declining number of reported crimes," the FBI said. The sharpest drops occurred in January and early February when the winter weather was at its worst, the bureau said.

In addition, sections of the country with the most severe weather experienced the greatest crime decreases. A 16 per cent decline was reported for north central states and a nine per cent drop for Northeastern states.

"The mugger apparently wasn't leaving the house, and neither was his potential victim," an FBI spokesman observed. But he said it's only a theory that the harsh weather contributed to the decline. There is no evidence to prove the theory.

However, in the West, where many areas escaped the winter harshness, the crime rate dropped only three per cent. There was an eight per cent decline in the South where some sections experienced unusual cold and snowy weather although not as severe as in the North.

The statistics for some major cities bore out the theory in some cases and seemed to contradict it in others.

Among cold-weather cities, Detroit reported crimes decreasing from 35,814 to 28,470, a 20 per cent plunge. There were substantial decreases in murder, robbery, assault, burglary and larceny.

Why the good neighbor went down to the docks.

Strange, but true: many a dock worker doesn't know how to swim. One step in the wrong direction—and a man could be in deep trouble.

Which is why, in Los Angeles, the American Red Cross—America's Good Neighbor—gives a water survival safety course to non-swimming waterfront workers.

If you live far from the waterfront, this may not seem important to you.

But it represents just what Red Cross is all about. Because The American Red Cross is a home town affair. That's why you find us doing different things in different home towns. We're what you need us to be. Whoever you are. Wherever you are.

And isn't that what a Good Neighbor is all about? Be a good neighbor. Help The Good Neighbor.

Local group serves 'Meals on Wheels'

The Soroptimist Club is an international women's service organization. The Manhattan chapter has several programs in the area, one of which is Meals on Wheels.

The Meals on Wheels program is a service which delivers prepared meals to the homes of handicapped or people who are unable to prepare meals for themselves, regardless of their age.

"The meals are nutritious and well-balanced and people on special diets can have meals prepared especially for their diet," said Ruth Foster, member of the Manhattan chapter.

The program began in 1965 when a club member was working on her thesis and wanted to do something as a service to the community. When the program began, the club ran the entire program — they bought the containers for the meals, had volunteers deliver the meals and local restaurants prepare them.

THE PROGRAM GREW so rapidly that the club turned it over to Memorial Hospital, which now delivers about 40 meals per day.

The club still gives financial support to the program and provides volunteers to deliver the meals.

The meals can be delivered for a minimum charge and the federal government pays the charge for those on welfare.

"As of 1976, the club voted to have United Social Agencies contribute the amount that we've been contributing so we can start something else," Foster said.

Women's major addition timely

By LAURIE LYNCH
Collegian Reporter

The new K-State Women's Studies program was created at an important time in history, said Sara Chapman, assistant dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

"At this time in our history we think the Women's Studies program has a place in the University," Chapman said. This, she said, may not always be true. It is hoped the program will be incorporated into other University programs.

The goal of the program is "to more fully humanize men and women," she said.

"We do think of the Women's Studies program as part of the humanistic interests of the University," she said.

The program was designed to expose men and women to the many career opportunities available to women. "So many people suffer from failure of the imagination," Chapman said. "They don't realize there are many things for them to do."

THE PROGRAM gives students an opportunity to examine the history and contributions of women in society. In order to achieve these goals, men must somehow be made aware of what women are learning in the courses, Chapman said.

"It creates increasing frustration and sometimes anger if women are aware of the opportunities and men aren't."

The program began last year and involves four colleges. They are the Colleges of Arts and Sciences, Education, Business and of Home Economics.

IT IS a 24 credit hour undergraduate program with six required hours. The requirements are Introduction to Women's Studies and Senior Seminar.

"We can offer as much to a student in this second major as we can in a regular major," she said.

The Women's Studies program is about, but not exclusively for, women. The need for the program is partly a result of the women's movement, but has nothing to do with the movement.

"The Women's Studies program at K-State is not political and does not exist to advocate the beliefs of the women's movement," Chapman said. "It exists as an academic movement to make women aware of the opportunities for themselves and understand the reason for social change."

THE PARTY'S OVER.

All too often, when the party ends, the trouble begins.

People who shouldn't be doing anything more active than going to sleep are driving a car. Speeding and weaving their way to death.

Before any of your friends drive home from your party, make sure they aren't drunk.

Don't be fooled because they drank only beer or wine. Beer and wine can be just as intoxicating as mixed drinks.

And don't kid yourself because they may have had some black coffee. Black coffee can't sober them up well enough to drive.

FRIENDS DON'T LET FRIENDS DRIVE DRUNK.

If someone gets too drunk to drive, drive him yourself. Or call a cab. Or offer to let him sleep over.

Maybe your friend won't be feeling so good on the morning after, but you're going to feel terrific.

Police read eviction notice to Kent State demonstrators

KENT, Ohio (AP) — Campus police read an eviction notice Sunday to demonstrators at Kent State University but they refused to leave the site where four students were shot to death by national guardsmen in a May 4, 1970, antiwar protest.

Six officers were on hand to read the 8 a.m. ultimatum as about 250 demonstrators milled around on the hillside where the four students were killed and nine others were wounded seven years ago.

As soon as they finished, the demonstrators read their own notice to the university to "cease and desist" with plans to build a $6-million gymnasium annex bordering the shooting site.

Then many of those encamped on Blanket Hill since May 12 began singing, "The people have the power, we will not be moved."

THE UNIVERSITY wants to begin construction of the 120,000-square-foot gym annex and says the demonstrators must move because contracts have been signed to start excavation.

Benson Wolman, executive director of the Ohio American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), said Sunday that ACLU attorneys were at Kent State observing the protest and preparing to counter what legal action the university might take against the protest.

"The ACLU has placed the university on notice and also the local court that it wishes to be notified of any legal proceedings so it can attend to oppose an eviction attempt," Wolman said.

Demonstrators, who call themselves the May Fourth Coalition, say building the annex will desecrate the hill which they want preserved as a memorial for the slain students.

"Tent City," as the demonstrators' encampment is called, began to bustle around dawn Sunday. Some students wore black armbands.

At the crest of the hill, there was an upside-down American flag with a square black flag on top.

Athletic deficit eliminated

By SHEREE LOWE
Collegian Reporter

The Intercollegiate Athletic Council (IAC) met Friday and announced the K-State athletic budget operating deficit, which at one time totaled $400,000, has been eliminated.

"Not only has the department not had to borrow from next year's income, but it had nearly $100,000 including contingencies on June 30, the end of the fiscal year," said Jersey Jermier, director of intercollegiate athletics.

"Now that we have the budget in the black we plan to try and continue operating under the current budget and let coaches work on reasonable sums," Jermier said.

ONE PROBLEM he reported is the warranty on the seven-year-old turf on the KSU Stadium field has expired and the turf is coming unglued.

Several possible alternatives, none of which are expected to be acted upon in the coming year, are being explored, according to Jermier.

The council approved the staff addition of an assistant for Bones Nays, assistant athletic director of fund raising and promotions, at a salary of $8,000.

A report on season football tickets revealed sales have increased in comparison to this time last year.

"At present sales are over 200, comparing last year's figures. Public and faculty sales have increased this year, with student sales running behind," Jermier said. "Over 6500 tickets have currently been sold in pre-season sales and fall registration will be our last big sale."

Lawyers differ on advertising ruling

By DENNIS BOONE
Collegian Reporter

In the legal circles of Manhattan, lawyers Donn Everett and Howard Fick represent the two ends of a short spectrum when mention is made of the Supreme Court's ruling allowing lawyers to advertise.

Fick, at one end, is bitterly against such a practice. Everett, who at best claims mixed reactions to the decision, represents the other end, although he is not wholly in favor of the idea.

"I have mixed reactions about the matter, but it was something that was kind of expected (the Court's ruling)," said Everett, who is also Manhattan's representative in the Kansas Senate. "A lot of lawyers advertise anyway, not taking out ads per se, but the decision won't have any change on the practice around here."

Everett said he believed his mixed emotions on the subject were from legal as well as personal viewpoints.

"The Court came down on its decision because of the First Amendment right to freedom of speech, which is what advertising in this instance would be," he said. "And if people feel more secure knowing what a lawyer charges through the advertising he uses, so be it."

EVERETT, however, is wary of the consequences of such a move by lawyers to advertise.

"I don't think advertising in any media really sells the product," he said. "The fact that you have a slick advertisement promoting a product does not mean that the product itself will be slick. It can be deceptive."

Fick said he disapproved of the Court's ruling.

"I don't think anything in law practice since I've been in it has made me as unhappy," he said.

The problem the ruling poses, Fick said, was one of survival of the fittest or, rather, the richest.

"It won't hurt me as much as it will the new lawyer right out of law school," Fick said. "In an established firm, a lawyer could dish out $10,000 for advertising expenses without batting an eye, if that's what it takes to stay in business. If that's what's necessary, that's what we would do. But to that new lawyer, who makes maybe $8,000 a year total, he just can't compete."

FICK likened the process of advertising among lawyers to the advertising of coffee makers and said, just as those coffee ads promote a product that is financially well-backed, advertising among lawyers would come easily for those with money.

"Then the young lawyer, although his product is as good as another lawyer's, would not be able to sell it without that advertising."

Fick also said he believed advertising would cheapen the profession, and he said he disliked the thought of a neon sign flashing "Bargains Today on Divorces."

Fick said he believed none of the larger firms in Riley County would start an advertising campaign of any kind. But if they did?

"We would follow suit to keep up with the competition, but that would be a sad day," Fick said.

EVERETT, who has practiced in Manhattan for more than 20 years since his graduation from Kansas University, said the Court's decision would most likely make its presence felt in major urban areas where people in need of legal assistance may fall prey to certain predators in the practice.

"Everybody's human, let's face it," Everett said. "People like to get what they can. It's just a question as to whether people will get quality work from the lawyers who will advertise."

Everett cited as an example the possibility of sloppy work being done on a cut-rate divorce special and he said the ramifications of not providing child support through carelessness could be "horrendous." Everett also said that, as in the past, a lawyer will develop his clientele through word-of-mouth because a lawyer's reputation outweighs advertising benefits.

"It's kind of sad to see it go (the restriction on advertising), but we are living in a new age," Everett said.

Fick, who said a meeting of members of the bar in Riley County produced no one strongly in favor of the Court ruling, reflected upon the day when all-out advertising campaigns will be waged.

"It will indeed be a sad day when it comes to that," he said. "And you know who is going to be paying for it — the consumer."

University recommends group living

By BARBARA RUST
Collegian Reporter

K-State's Housing Department requires all single freshmen to live in either a residence hall or a Greek chapter house, reads the K-State Bulletin, a University newsletter.

According to the Department of Housing, freshmen are "encouraged" to live there and some students assume this doesn't mean they must. Housing, however, interprets the rule differently. If there is dormitory space, freshmen must fill it and are "required" to do so, as stated in the Bulletin.

RON NELSON, president of the K-State chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), said he believes the rule violates students' first and fourteenth amendment rights.

"The wording says 'required'. I would not mind if they put down 'the Housing Department suggests'," Nelson said. "In that, housing should give a reason why they suggest it."

"The basic philosophy for it (the rule) is a large part of University experience is outside the classroom," said Thomas Frith, director of housing. "We encourage people (to live on campus) because most people profit by living in the dorm."

Frith said he believes making friends is easier by living in the dorm and, if the incoming freshman lives off campus, he may have difficulty adjusting to college life.

IN GENERAL, many people who commute miss much of the college life, said Robert Sinnett, director of mental health at Lafene Student Health Center. A problem with off-campus housing, Sinnett said, is people can end up in isolated units.

"I think there is definitely educational value to be gained from living in a dormitory," said Tim Landon, Ford Hall summer director. "The residence hall is a tremendous education for the student socially. It teaches him to get along with other people, to make friends and to give himself more of a chance to become the best he can be."

The rule is a suggestion, not a requirement, and doesn't apply to everybody. If someone wants an isolated life, he shouldn't be forced to live in the dormitory, Frith said.

"Most people think we are trying to control them, but this is not the case," Frith said. "Dormitories set their own policies. People also think we are trying to keep the halls filled with this rule, but we have over 100 contracts we can't find room for."

ACCORDING TO Nyles Davis, K-State student attorney, higher education isn't a fundamental right, as voting is. When dealing with non-fundamental rights, the state needs a rational purpose to uphold its rulings.

"As long as the institution could give a reason that would indicate the ruling was in furtherance of the students' education, it would probably be upheld," Davis said.

In the late 1960s, courts supported students in housing rulings.

In Mollere vs. Southeastern Louisiana College in 1969, a court ruled a college couldn't require women less than 21-years-old to live on campus to pay back the dorm debt, Nelson said.

THE 8TH U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in 1974 the University of South Dakota didn't violate students' rights of privacy or equal protection by forcing unmarried freshmen and sophomores to live in the dorm, Davis said.

"Courts are recognizing Frith's argument as a legitimate purpose," he said. "A rational basis must be given and a lot of universities have given similar arguments."

According to Nelson, ACLU intends to inform the University of its reasons for opposing the rule. If no action is taken by the University, ACLU's state Board of Directors will be informed of the situation and decide what to do from there.

Frith suggested at the last Housing Council meeting to change the rule's wording, but the student members voted to keep the rule as it was, he said. The council believes living in a dorm is a good experience for most people.

FOR TEN CENTS YOU COULD SAVE A FRIEND'S LIFE.

A phone call. A simple, ten-cent phone call for a cab could save your friend's life.

If your friend has been drinking too much, he shouldn't be driving.

The automobile crash is the number one cause of death of people your age. And the ironic thing is that the drunk drivers responsible for killing young people are most often other young people.

Take a minute. Spend a dime. Call a cab. That's all. If you can't do that, drive him yourself. Or let him sleep on your couch.

We're not asking you to be a doctor or a cop. Just a friend.

WASHINGTON — The Food and Drug Administration said Sunday that the painted cartoons on the outside of MacDonald's glasses contain lead, but it is not ordering a recall because there is "no indication of an acute health hazard."

However, the federal agency ordered further tests on the glasses, which the huge hamburger chain has distributed by the millions.

MacDonald's Corp. has suspended promotion and distribution of its "glasses to go" program, but it disputed the accuracy of earlier tests that led the Massachusetts Health Department to raise an alarm about the glasses' possible lead hazard.

The FDA said it has found that lead from the painted cartoons can migrate when the glasses are washed or come in contact with the acid from citrus juices.

TOKYO — Prime Minister Takeo Fukuda's Liberal Democratic party (LDP) took an early lead in balloting for the upper house of parliament Sunday in an election regarded as a major test of the LDP's wavering strength. Major newspaper polls predicted the ruling party would fall short of retaining a majority.

The state-owned Japan Broadcasting Corp. reported that 38 LDP and eight opposition candidates were elected to the 252-seat House of Councillors some four and one-half hours after ballot-counting began.

Definitive results were not expected until Monday afternoon.

SEOUL, South Korea — The toll of missing and dead climbed to 335 Sunday as rescue workers combed suburban Seoul for survivors of one of South Korea's worst floods. Officials said the floods drove more than 77,000 persons from their homes and caused up to $20 million damage.

More than 16,000 houses were flooded or destroyed in landslides. Some residents returned to their homes as waters receded Sunday, but nearly 20,000 persons remained in school classrooms and churches in Seoul as the Red Cross and other agencies rushed relief.

The national flood relief center said 188 persons were dead, 147 reported missing and 397 hospitalized as a result of the flood and related accidents triggered by up to 17 inches of rain on Friday and early Saturday. More rain was forecast Monday.

SANTA ANA, Calif. — After duping the owner into believing they wanted to make a deposit, well-organized robbers took $1.1 million in gold, silver and currency from a coin storage firm, police said. Then they used the owner's Lincoln as a getaway car.

Police were searching Sunday for the team of "several" thieves and voiced suspicions that it might be an inside job.

HELSINKI, Finland — Two hijackers seized an Aeroflot jetliner carrying 79 persons on a domestic flight in the Soviet Union Sunday night and forced it to land at Helsinki airport, the national news agency STT said.

The agency said that while airborne, the pilot had asked permission to land at Arlanda airport in Stockholm, Sweden, but diverted to Helsinki instead.

The plane was identified as a TU134 twin-engine jet.

KANSAS CITY — Pinch hitter Cookie Rojas' RBI single following an intentional walk to Amos Otis capped a three-run rally in the bottom of the ninth inning, lifting the Kansas City Royals to a 5-4 victory over the Oakland A's Sunday.

Doug Bird, 4-1, picked up the victory, limiting the A's to one hit in two and one-third innings.

Students observe farming in Europe

By MIKE NOEL
Collegian Reporter

A group of students from K-State and the University of Missouri spent a month this summer in Europe studying agricultural customs.

George Ward, professor of agriculture science and industry, was the K-State sponsor for the trip that took the students to 10 countries in 25 days.

"The purpose of this trip was agricultural, cultural and social. You can't go over there without getting some cultural experiences," Ward said.

Of all the differences in farms and farming techniques Ward saw while in Europe, farm sizes and machinery were the most obvious, he said.

"Most of the farms in the countries we visited were small. They used small tractors and used a considerable amount of hand work," Ward said.

"I don't think I saw more than four pick-up trucks in all of Europe," Ward said. "Most farmers have a two-wheel trailer they hook on the back of their tractors to do all their hauling."

THE TRIP took the students first to England where they toured Rothamsted Experiment Station which, according to Ward, is the oldest experiment station in the world. While in England, the group also toured the Plant Breeding Institute and the Reproductive Physiology Laboratory, both of which are affiliated with Cambridge University.

They then visited the Polder Area in the Netherlands. This area is land reclaimed from the sea. Dikes are built in the sea to pump out water and the land is then used for agricultural purposes.

THE GROUP also visited France for a food warehouse and winery tour; a dairy farm in Switzerland; a fruit and vegetable farm in Northern Italy; a dairy processing plant in Austria and a Claas combine factory in Germany. Stops in Denmark, Sweden and Norway completed the trip.

The K-State students making the trip were Alan Ladd, junior in animal science and industry; Kathy Franklin, junior in animal science and industry; Mark Scanlon, sophomore in milling science and management; Martin Schneider, freshman in general agriculture; Chris Straits, sophomore in animal science and industry; Randy Tosh, freshman in horticulture; and Marty Vanier, junior in animal science and industry.

Women's equality; weekend topic

This weekend, women from all over the state will convene in Wichita for Kansas Women's Weekend, a public meeting of Kansas women of all ages, incomes, races and religions.

The meeting is a result of Public Law 94-167, a bill which appropriated funds to each state for conventions to discuss and adopt recommendations to be presented to President Carter, Congress and the public. The weekend's goals are to look at the status of women and outline changes in policies which obstruct women's equality.

It is imperative these goals are not lost due to an avalanche of private interests which may concentrate on certain key issues. Religious groups, anti-abortionists and anti-ERA groups are sending blocks of substantial numbers to fight for their specific platforms.

AT OTHER state conventions, such groups disrupted the meetings with their takeover attitudes and the whole point of unity was virtually lost in the shuffle.

The significance of these key issues is not to be minimized. The convention, however, is not a bull session. It is comprised of numerous specialized workshops, led by competent professionals, designed to increase understanding and function as educational precedes to the making of resolutions for the National Women's Convention. The workshops will culminate in a general voting session and are integral in the forming of fair, representative resolutions.

Participants' attitudes will shape the historical significance of the upcoming event. Now is the time. Anyone who cares anything at all about the rights and status of women in America had better stand up and be counted at Kansas Women's Weekend.

Aggieville Meat Market

The scene: the opening of the Aggieville Meat Market. The time: 1977. Spotlights search the air, calling men into the small, smoke-filled arena. Raucous music screams, breaking the stilted silence which permeates the gathering.

The men are all here; fraternity men, dormitory men, men from off-campus. They sit talking, guzzling beer, waiting for the evening's activities to begin.

The master of ceremonies, in his faded blue jeans and stylish rugby shirt, walks onto the stage.

"Welcome, gentlemen, to the first-ever 'parade of meat'. This event has been scheduled so you no longer will have to travel from bar to bar looking for a female to spend the evening with. The ladies have all been gathered here for your convenience and the show will begin soon."

CHAIRS SHUFFLE as the men turn toward the stage to get a better view. Hoots and whistles resound, almost drowning out the music.

"And now, for your delectation, the first piece of meat. A fine strapping girl, raised on a farm outside the teeming metropolis of Moonshine, Kansas, she embodies all the charms and fun of the farm. Notice her pointed-toe cowboy boots with their careful styling. Don't miss her straight-legged blue jeans and her gingham cowboy shirt. This is choice meat, my friends, what am I bid?"

Two drunk men begin the bidding, promising the woman all the beer she can drink and a fine time at their ranches. One falls down drunk, the other wins the fair maiden by default.

Not for trivia fans only...

The next time you find yourself with nothing to do (or procrastinating about something that needs your attention), find yourself a copy of the "People's Almanac," a book of unusual facts compiled by Irving Wallace and his son, David Wallechinsky.

The book is jam-packed with facts that are not only interesting and informative, but ones that could make you the conversation star at your next party or excursion to Aggieville.

For instance, did you know that Thomas Jefferson ran up a personal wine bill while at the White House during his presidency of $10,835? He also suffered migraine headaches that sometimes lasted for six weeks.

THE famous "Baby Ruth" candy bar was named after Grover Cleveland's oldest daughter, and not after the baseball star, Babe Ruth. And Dubble Bubble Gum used to be called Blibber Blubber.

The Spanish Influenza epidemic, also known as "la grippe," killed 21,640,000 in 1918. The epidemic started at Fort Riley, Kansas.

Casanova reportedly ate 50 oysters for breakfast. And Mata Hari, the famous spy, was a renowned dancer who sometimes performed in the nude. She had countless lovers and charged at a minimum of $7,500 per night.

UNDER THE list of famous gays you'll find the names of Socrates, Aristotle, Leonardo da Vinci, Dag Hammarskjold, Tennessee Williams, Emily Dickinson and Gertrude Stein.

You'll learn that a computer determined the 1927 Yankees to be the best baseball team ever and a computer proclaimed

Rocky Marciano as the best boxer.

Under sports oddities, you'll find that Bob Waterfield threw a football 60 feet at 68.18 miles per hour.

There are probably a million more facts in the book, many to out-do the ones you just read. And if you like lists, the same authors have just published a book of lists that will no doubt be as interesting as the "People's Almanac."

Letter to the editor

Touching means friendship

Editor,

I was very pleased when I read the article last Tuesday, "Touching creates fear," by Lisa Carmichael. It is especially true in the United States, no matter which city you are in, if you touch someone of the same sex, you are definitely labeled "weird". Some people even look down on you and cause trouble.

In Saudi Arabia, hugging and kissing are done frequently among friends and family, especially if you are away for some time. This is just an indication of affection and how much we care about each other. We have never thought of touching, kissing or hugging a person of the same sex to be a label of homosexuality.

The article brought to my mind an incident which happened last May. When a Saudi friend was to go home for leave, I and two other Saudis took him to the airport. Before checking-in, we kissed him because this is our tradition and it only means we are good friends. Some people think this is a weird thing to do. For those who think so, do they want us to live in fear and forget our beliefs?

U.S. asks help in eliminating illegitimate grain practices

WASHINGTON (AP) — The United States is enlisting help from all foreign buyers of American grains to rid that scandal-scarred business of such illegitimate practices as short-weighting and sale of dirty grain.

Senior Agriculture Department officials said overseas governments and private importers are being invited to register prompt complaints when they suspect that they are being sold inferior grades of grain for less than they paid for.

The government's initiative follows a series of scandals in the early 1970s that rocked some of the country's giant national and multinational grain corporations.

The scandals have produced scores of indictments. In Louisiana alone, 71 out of 75 individuals and companies have been convicted of various misdeeds. Other cases still are under investigation.

The government of India has legal claims pending in American courts totaling $214 million against five leading U.S. grain companies. India charges that from 1961 to 1975 the firms delivered short-weighted and inferior grades of grain.

Federal authorities also have filed a series of litigations against some big U.S. grain corporations — including one action involving $24 million against Cook Industries Inc. on charges of shortweighting grain shipments to foreign customers. Cook is the world's biggest grain exporter.

Many of these problems surfaced during the administrations of former Presidents Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford. Ford himself pressed for reform legislation designed to crack down on the wrongdoers.

One U.S.D.A. official said the Carter administration is showing a "keen interest" in the workings of new procedures, including a Federal Grain Inspection Service, set up a year ago to monitor the grain export business.

"There seems to be a clear-cut wish to restore America's reputation as a fair-and-square trading nation," the official said.

The Indian government has been holding back on its claims pending the outcome of the federal investigations.

"If the U.S. government itself succeeds in proving its charges, then our job, involving actions against some of the same exporters, will be made easier and we then may find it possible to arrange out-of-court settlements," one Indian official said.

Panel discusses Manhattan restaurants

By SHEREE LOWE
Collegian Reporter

The food served in restaurants is good and there is a variety of services offered to restaurant customers, according to Manhattan restaurant owners.

A panel discussion by three local restaurant owners and managers on "In Search of an Elusive Good Meal" was sponsored by UFM Thursday.

The panel represented various restaurant businesses, including Karen Streeter, co-owner of Vista Drive-Ins; Martha Reynard, owner of Reynards; and Larry Crownover, general manager of JD's Pizza and Steak House and Kennedy's Claim. All three managers agreed they would not be in the restaurant business if they didn't feel their food was good.

RESPONDING TO a question regarding liquor by the drink, the panel agreed a restaurant should be judged by the quality of the food they serve, not by what beverages they offer. The panel was not opposed to liquor by the drink, but said the Kansas Restaurant Board of Directors has been lobbying with the State Legislature on the issue and believes it will take time before the law will be changed.

One restaurant manager expressed concern regarding private clubs. He said he did not believe club owners would be inclined to vote in favor of liquor by the drink, especially those that don't serve food because they aren't ready to compete with restaurants.

Organization, constant supervision and lack of employee turnover were cited as keys to consistency in the quality of food and service for all three restaurants represented.

Discussing customer complaints, the panel members agreed they would much rather a customer voice a complaint and not walk out the door with it. The only way for restaurant owners to correct a situation is to find out what the complaints are and try and comply with what the customers want, according to panel members.

Professor revises feed reference text

Harry Pfost, professor of grain science and industry has just completed editing the book, Feed Manufacturing Technology, for the American Feed Manufacturers Association (AFMA).

The book is a reference and guide for the production of high quality feed, and is the only one of its kind in the world. Gerald Karstens, AFMA vice president, said Pfost revised 80 per cent of the contents.

"No single text existed for formal training in feed technology, although the feed industry was nearly 100 years old," Karstens said.

Guerillas turn against leader; surrender commandeered jet

DAMASCUS, Syria (AP) — A hijack drama that lasted 44 hours and covered more than 1,600 miles ended Sunday when five Palestinian guerrillas turned against their leader and surrendered, Syrian officials said.

Two Arab officials and five British crew members of a Kuwait Airlines jet were free unharmed by the guerrillas, led by a radical Palestinian who reportedly escaped from a Beirut jail while facing fraud and extortion charges.

The hijack began Friday when a Boeing 707 with 49 passengers and crew aboard was commandeered in Beirut and flown to Kuwait. After 25 hours of negotiations in the sweltering heat at Kuwait's airport, the last of the original hostages were exchanged for two volunteer hostages, a fresh flight crew and a promise of safe conduct.

THE END CAME after a conference in the Damascus control tower between Syrian negotiators, led by air force commander Gen. Naji Jamil, and a 21-year-old Lebanese hijacker who officials said looked near collapse.

A Syrian spokesman said the hijackers were persuaded to defy their leader, who was refusing to give in unless all his demands were met. The demands were not spelled out but were said to be connected to an internal feud in the Palestinian movement.

Abu Saed, the hijack leader, walked off the Boeing 707 with five other Palestinians into the hands of Syrian police. Syrian officials said they had guaranteed the hijackers "absolute safety." They did not elaborate but some sources speculated they would be jailed.

Bomb explodes in Damascus

CAIRO (AP) — A bomb exploded in a car in downtown Damascus Sunday near the Syrian Interior Ministry, killing two persons and injuring 53 others, the Middle East News Agency (MENA) said in a report from the Syrian capital.

Nineteen persons were hospitalized, including two reported in serious condition, the agency said.

The blast caused heavy damage to a mosque, a hotel and a row of shops, MENA reported. The report did not mention any damage to the Interior Ministry.

It said Syrian authorities found evidence in the wreckage of the car indicating Iraq engineered the explosion.

A CAR bomb went off in Damascus last Monday outside

Syrian air defense headquarters, killing six persons and wounding 11. Syria blamed Iraq for that blast as well.

MENA quoted Damascus Radio as saying the car that exploded Sunday carried German license plates, but did not say whether they were East or West German plates. The radio said the car entered Syria last Monday, the same day as the earlier explosion, but did not say where the crossing was made.

Syria has blamed Iraq for a series of explosions in Syrian cities for more than a year.

The two Arab nations are ruled by rival wings of the Arab socialist Baath party. Their ideological feuds carried them to the brink of war when Iraq massed troops along Syria's border last year after Syria sent soldiers to quell the civil war in Lebanon.

Office helps students in search of housing

By EDMUNDEJEKAM
Collegian Reporter

Students seeking off-campus housing or needing roommates off-campus next fall can receive assistance from the Department of Housing on four Saturdays this summer.

The housing office will be open July 16 and 30 and Aug. 6 and 13, from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Students specifically seeking roommates are advised to arrive at 10 a.m.

"We thought of this arrangement particularly for people who have difficulty getting here during the week because they may be at work," said Douglas de Mahy, off-campus housing officer.

Given the reported increase in enrollment, the demand for off-campus housing could rise next fall. According to Thomas Frith, housing director, the residence halls were filled in early June.

DE MAHY SAID the housing office usually provided roommate selection forms on which students indicated what type of roommates they wanted and also their own living habits and other preferences. The completed forms were then left in the office where students can examine them.

"We will still use the forms this year, but we're also making an actual effort to help the students meet their needs," deMahy said.

On the designated Saturdays, students will have access to the office phones to inquire about advertised housing and they will be advised on what to expect in the Manhattan housing market and their rights and obligations as tenants.

"There are so many of these things to discuss, so we have decided to gather the students in small manageable groups to enhance free discussion," said Carla Fears, off-campus housing director.

She said students are often driven by desperation to rent apartments larger than they actually need and later have trouble finding roommates to help fill space and share expenses.

"I would say that if we can take care of any student at all it will be worth the effort," Frith said. "We will continue the service as long as it is needed."

K-State fraternity pledging increases

The 25 social fraternities at K-State have reported 187 pledges since the beginning of the summer pledging period May 28.

Jerry Lilly, K-State fraternity advisor, said the fraternities will pledge from 450 to 500 men during this year's summer rush. Last year, 419 men were pledged. This is the 13th year K-State fraternities have accepted new members in the summer months. There is no longer a fall rush for men.

Lilly said anyone interested in fraternities could contact him in the office of the K-State Vice-President for Student Affairs.

Program helps teach English to wives of foreign students

By DIANE GONZOLAS
Collegian Reporter

The wives of foreign students will soon have a program designed to help them with their English problems.

A Community Education Training Act (CETA) grant has been signed and the money will soon be available for an educational program said Pat Campbell, a former instructor at the Adult Learning Center who has been working on the program.

Five teachers will be hired to work 20 hours a week. Campbell said orientation and training for the teachers will begin July 18 and will continue through the end of July to early August. Campbell said she hopes the program can start by the beginning of fall semester.

THERE WILL be two teachers at the adult learning center, one with the public school system and two at the new international center. The teachers at the international center will coordinate volunteers.

"The project is really the result of a year's work," Campbell said. A volunteer school held one day a week was organized last year.

"We felt one day a week wasn't enough," she said. "What we did last year didn't meet the need, but showed there was a need. This group of women (foreign student's wives) are unique. There's no place they can go."

CAMPBELL SAID other funding possibilities were investigated. A lab system through the Department of Modern Languages was looked into but Campbell said it would be difficult to set up. University funding isn't available because the wives aren't students.

"Continuing Education could start something like this but the cost would be so high," Campbell said. Work on CETA funding began in April. "The reason we went through CETA is that they have funds. Our program doesn't really fit CETA."

"The purpose of CETA is to get people off of unemployment," she said. "The kind of people we want are not really the kind of people CETA is designed to help."

SHE SAID the teachers they hire must have a strong interest in international students.

"We want this to be their main interest — not money," she said. Campbell said she had to turn down qualified applicants because they couldn't meet CETA's requirements.

"I didn't really realize how stringent that (CETA's requirement law) was," Campbell said. CETA requires the applicant have a very low income and be on unemployment and wants to get off. The individual must also have been actively searching for work for 15 weeks and be unable to find employment."

Campbell said she hopes the interests of the program and the interests of CETA can be meshed to find the right people. Interviews are in progress to select the five people for the positions.

Vacationers should safeguard health

By DIANE GONZOLAS
Collegian Reporter

Vacations — exciting places, new experiences, good times.

Vacations can also mean sunburn, diarrhea and blisters. Unfortunately, many travelers end up seeing more of these conditions than they want. Health safeguards are just as important as getting tickets and making reservations.

"Any time someone changes their environment there are going to be added risks involved," said Michael Bradshaw, director of health education at Lafene Student Health Center. "Individuals should be aware of that and plan for the possibility of accident or injury."

If a vacationer will be traveling a great distance or for a long time an important precaution to take is to visit a doctor, according to the July Changing Times. If he is going abroad he will need to find out which vaccinations and inoculations are advisable for the countries he plans to visit about two months in advance.

IF THE traveler has a chronic illness, allergy or other special problem a doctor can give him any written statement and medications that may be necessary. It is very important for any traveler to know his blood type. A dental visit can also prevent problems.

Changing Times also recommends putting together a medical kit containing such items as aspirin, insect repellent, a thermometer and an extra pair of eyeglasses. If traveling overseas, it's a good idea to include a directory of physicians which is available from the International Association for Medical Assistance to Travelers.

According to Changing Times the best way to start a vacation is to get plenty of rest and eat lightly before the trip. Finish work and packing early to avoid last minute nervousness. If motion sickness is a problem, start taking medication for it before the trip.

CHANGING TIMES suggests the traveler check out the places he plans to visit before leaving. Finding out about climate, altitude, food, air and water is a good way to prepare for changes.

A hectic schedule plus other travel activities — carrying baggage, walking more than usual, time changes — can be exhausting.

"Individuals try to plan too much and become physically fatigued," Bradshaw said. "They can have problems with their feet and with sore muscles."

Bradshaw said trying to cram too much into a vacation is a cause of many travel accidents.

"Many of us are guilty," he said. "We want to drive too far too long. You just don't function as well in those types of conditions."

THE MOST common travel illness is diarrhea, according to Changing Times. In most cases, the cause is eating contaminated food or water. There is no fool-proof method of avoiding "Montezuma's revenge," but caution can minimize the risk.

Terry Pearson, manager of Kansas State Travel, offered some suggestions for a traveler in Mexico or tropical climates.

"Always eat food that was freshly cooked and still hot when served," he said. "Only eat fruit with skin that can be peeled off."

Drinking bottled water is a must in certain areas, he said, and it should also be used when brushing teeth. He recommended hard boiled eggs as a good snack for day-long excursions. Salads and uncooked vegetables should be avoided.

"Some people think that if they eat a hot meal it will burn away any contamination but we tell them that's not always so," Pearson said. If diarrhea does strike, it doesn't have to be a vacation disaster. Resting and eating bland foods will usually clear up the condition and a doctor can recommend medication.

WHILE GUARDING against diarrhea, it's important to eat a balanced diet on vacation. One of the problems, according to "How to Stay Healthy While Traveling" by Bob and Mary Young, is that protein foods such as meat are usually the first to be excluded by a budgeting traveler because of the cost.

The Youngs' recommend eating high protein substitutes such as non-fat powdered milk and peanut butter and taking a daily vitamin supplement. Good care of the feet is also stressed by the Youngs. They suggest wearing comfortable, broken-in shoes. Areas that frequently develop blisters should be covered with adhesive tape or bandages before doing any walking.

Sunburn is another common vacation hazard.

"It (sunburn) can be quite serious," Bradshaw said. "An individual can become quite ill. It can really ruin a vacation."

BRADSHAW SAID the most common case of sunburn is the person who works inside all day and then spends three or four hours in the sun the first day.

"Prevention is the greatest thing with sunburn," he said. "One should start the tanning process early if they know they're going to be in the sun." Sunscreen and lotion are important for a vacationer, he said.

He said people can get burned more easily at high altitudes because there is less screen between them and the sun. He said he encourages sunburn victims to use something to relieve pain and to prevent infection. Light clothing that doesn't irritate the burn areas should be worn but the individual should be aware sun can penetrate clothing which makes the burn worse.

When Mike Finamore was thirteen years old, he was told he had leukemia.

At that time, this meant he had five, maybe six months, to live.

But just about then, leukemia research produced some dramatic results:

A special combination of drugs that would kill the leukemia cells in the blood and permit the person to live longer than ever before.

So Mike was treated. And it worked.

He didn't die.

Instead, he became one of the fortunate few to have leukemia and live. And today his weekly treatments enable him to lead a normal life.

In fact, right now he's putting the roof on a house he built himself.

And when it's finished there will be a double celebration.

The new house. And Mike's 22nd birthday.

Hostages escape; hijackers halt talks

HELSINKI, Finland (AP) — The remaining three hostages aboard a Soviet airliner escaped early Tuesday, leaving the two armed hijackers alone on the plane, a government spokesman said.

Asked if the military was preparing to move in on the TU134 jetliner, in which the hijackers had hoped to escape from the Soviet Union to Sweden, the spokesman said, "We'll try to persuade them (the hijackers) to surrender."

A Russian air hostess was quoted as saying the hijackers were armed with hand grenades and explosives.

They seized the Aeroflot jet with 78 other passengers and crew on a domestic flight Sunday night and ordered it to Sweden. But the plane landed in Helsinki, where, early Monday, Finnish officials began negotiating with the hijackers through a window of the plane.

Shortly before midnight, the hijackers closed the window, an airport official said. It was unclear whether they meant to break off the negotiations or to suspend them for the night.

IN THE COURSE of the day-long negotiations, the hijackers released their hostages in several groups, starting with 42 women and children. The last group of 20 men was released shortly before the window was closed.

Seven crewmen escaped from the plane soon after it landed Sunday in Helsinki, and six passengers escaped through the plane's rear door Monday afternoon, officials said.

The two skyjackers, who had threatened to blow up the plane unless it was refueled and flown to Sweden or another country, let four deadlines pass without incident.

At one point, they were offered a light plane to fly them out of Finland, but turned down the offer, airport officials said.

Finland has an agreement with the Soviet Union, its big eastern neighbor, to extradite automatically all air hijackers.

THE HOSTAGES, freed from the plane early in the day were reported in good condition and the only injury was a twisted ankle suffered by one of the men who escaped. They were flown back to the Soviet Union last night.

The conditions of the last 20 released were not known immediately.

The twin-engine TU134 medium-range jet remained standing at a remote corner of the Helsinki airport where it was towed after landing Sunday night. It was ringed by heavily armed Finnish troops.

The plane, with 78 passengers and crew aboard in addition to the hijackers, was commandeered Sunday night on a 175-mile domestic hop from Petrozavodsk, the capital of Soviet Karelia, to Leningrad.

THE HIJACKERS demanded to be flown to Stockholm, where another Soviet hijacker landed in May, and was not shipped back to Russia.

Finnish Police Chief J. Kaalas told Swedish TV the Soviet pilot apparently bluffed the hijackers into thinking they were landing in Stockholm when he set down in Helsinki.

The Swedes subsequently declared they would not let the hijackers into Sweden, and Finnish authorities said the hijackers demanded to be flown "to some other country." They threatened to blow up the plane and set four deadlines, all of which passed without incident, officials said.

Kaalas said negotiations with the hijackers were being conducted through a window of the jetliner. A government communique described the talks as "intensive negotiations to reach a peaceful solution."

FINNISH OFFICIALS said that at one point the hijackers were offered a small Cessna plane, presumably to fly them out of Finland, but they refused it.

Senate retains plutonium fast breeder

WASHINGTON (AP)—The Senate handed President Carter a stinging defeat Monday by refusing to kill the plutonium-powered fast breeder nuclear power plant at Oak Ridge, Tenn.

By a 49-to-38 vote, the Senate rejected Carter's belief that the United States should give up plans to rely upon plutonium as a major source of nuclear energy.

Instead, the Senate adopted, by a voice vote, a compromise opposed by the Carter administration which will keep the Clinch River plant alive.

The compromise proposed by Sen. Frank Church, D-Idaho, allows $75 million to be spent over the next year, although no construction on the controversial facility would be permitted pending further research.

CARTER'S unsuccessful attempt to kill Clinch River was led by Sen. Dale Bumpers, D-Ark., who said the United States can hardly urge other nations to restrict development of dangerous weapons, if it continues producing large amounts of plutonium.

"I think the United States has a moral obligation on this," Bumpers said.

Unlike uranium used in most nuclear power plants, plutonium can be used much more easily to produce nuclear weapons. Critics of fast breeder plants have predicted they will make it easy for terrorists to manufacture nuclear explosives.

Moreover, Bumpers said just because the French, West Germans and Japanese are going ahead with plutonium-fueled plants, there is no reason for the United States to do the same.

The $2.2 billion planned for Clinch River would be better spent on some other form of energy, like solar heating or cooling, he said.

CHURCH SAID his amendment an Energy Research and Development Administration authorization bill will give Carter a chance, if he can, to persuade other countries to back away from their own commitments to plutonium.

Church said even if that fails, and the United States goes ahead with fast breeder plants, the technology of plutonium reactors is such that they will provide a place to store the same dangerous fuels the critics are worried about.

Rather than having to find burial places for used up nuclear waste, Church said fast breeder plants will provide a place to put them safely.

Earlier Monday, despite complaints of a federal bailout, the Senate voted to provide $14 million in public funds for a privately operated nuclear reprocessing plant that will shut down if the President succeeds in discouraging use of plutonium as a major source of nuclear energy.

Post office requests commercial rate hikes

WASHINGTON (AP)—The Postal Service began legal steps Monday to raise mail rates next year, but at President Carter's request excluded private individuals' letters from the increases.

The service's governing board approved the schedule of increases averaging 22 per cent for the various classes of mail. But letters sent by individuals would remain at the current 13 cents, while those sent by businesses would increase to 16 cents.

Postmaster General Benjamin Bailar told reporters after the board meeting that postal officials would file legal papers with the independent Postal Rate Commission "within the next two or three days" seeking approval for the new rates.

"There will be no change in postal rates for the next 10 months" while the commission considers the proposed rates, Bailar said. First class rates last went up in December 1975.

BAILAR previously had said that all first class rates probably would rise next year. But last week he proposed keeping the current 13-cent rate for private correspondence at Carter's suggestion. The President said private citizens need some relief from postal rate hikes.

Under the "citizen rate," letter writers would have to meet these requirements:

- Either the return or delivery address must be handwritten.
- Both must include zip codes.
- Both places must be in the United States.
- The envelope must meet the size, shape and height limits of mail handling machines.

The 13-cent rate would not apply to business and other organizations that account for 80 per cent of first class mail. However, business mailers could reduce their rate to 14 cents if they do preliminary sorting before delivering letters to the post office.

BUSINESS NOW can mail sorted letters for 12 cents each. Bailar has expressed the hope that the citizen discount would lead to acceptance of his cost-cutting programs. One program under consideration is elimination of Saturday deliveries.

Other proposed new rates would be: postcards 10 cents, now nine cents; special delivery $2, now $1.25, and certified mail 90 cents, now 60 cents.

Alleged terrorist sympathy strains U.S.-Yugoslavia ties

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia (AP) — Yugoslavian relations with the United States are cooling because of what the Yugoslavs contend is U.S. tolerance of terrorist attacks on Yugoslav institutions.

The government daily newspaper Borba said Monday there were 18 cases of grave terrorist attacks on Yugoslav missions in the United States during the last decade and that no one was ever charged for them. The allegation could not be confirmed with U.S. authorities.

The newspaper complained specifically about three Croatians freed on bail by U.S. courts after being accused of attacking the Yugoslav U.N. mission and wounding a Yugoslav official in New York on June 14.

"Our good relations and cooperation are at present faced with serious threats because of the dangerous actions of Fascist terrorist groups on U.S. territory against Yugoslavia," the newspaper said in an editorial. "The consequences of such policies are becoming ever graver. . . The American government is responsible for such development."

RELATIONS have deteriorated for at least a year, and the decline comes at what may be a crucial time in the history of Yugoslavia, ruled by 85-year-old President Tito.

Yugoslavia blamed the decline partly on former U.S. Ambassador Laurence Silberman, who publicly campaigned for the release of Lazlo Toth, a dual national from Denver charged with espionage and jailed for 11 months for taking a picture of a sugar factory. President Tito publicly denounced Silberman last July for meddling but Toth was released.

Silberman's resignation last November and the visit in May of Vice President Walter Mondale warmed relations somewhat. Mondale cleared one stumbling block, announcing the United States had approved plans for a U.S. firm to finish work on the Communist nation's first nuclear plant.

But the downward trend resumed with the new dispute over the Croatians who rushed into the U.N. mission, holed up in an upstairs room and tossed out leaflets demanding freedom for Croatia before surrendering.

NEW YORK State charged Marijan Buconic, Jozo Brekalo and Vladimir Dizdar with attempted murder, assault, possession of weapons and burglary. The federal government charged the three with conspiracy to seize Yugoslav U.N. Ambassador Jaska Petric and accused Dizdar of firing the shot that hit mission guard Radomir Medic.

Prosecutors urged no bail but

New York State Supreme Court Judge Ernst Rosenberg set bail at $75,000 for Buconic and $40,000 for the others while a U.S. District Court set bail at $100,000 each.

The Yugoslav newspaper said the courts acted differently in the case of five Croatian separatists who hijacked a TWA jetliner last September because "terrorists in that case killed an American policeman and jeopardized lives of American citizens, which was sufficient that their crime has not been appraised as an incident but a premeditated crime."

The hijackers have been found guilty of air piracy and other charges and face sentences ranging from 20 years to life imprisonment.

Teenager convicted of area burglaries

One of three Seattle, Wash., teen-agers arrested two months ago for the investigation of more than 100 north-central Kansas burglaries was sentenced to prison Monday.

Lewis Sloniker, 18, the oldest member of the trio, was sentenced to one to 10 years in prison after pleading guilty at his arraignment in Riley County District Court. Judge Ronald Innes sentenced Sloniker for the burglary of a local restaurant, and a second count was dismissed.

Sloniker was arrested early in May with his 17-year old brother, Stephen, and 16-year-old Patrick Schy. Schy and Stephen Sloniker were found delinquent in May for their alleged participation in burglaries and were later transferred to Clay Center to face additional charges. They escaped from the county jail May 23 and have not been recaptured.

Students travel state, promote tourist spots

With an El Dorado van and information on Kansas tourist attractions, two K-State students are traveling and making money this summer.

Patty Macke, senior in radio and television, and Pam Grout, senior in journalism, have been selected by the Kansas Department of Economic Development to travel the eastern part of the state and promote the events and attractions Kansas offers to summer tourists.

"We travel for 10 weeks and our main objective is to change the image tourists have of Kansas," Grout said.

"We visit every city that has any attraction that would appeal to tourists and set up a table and distribute information on what people can do in our state," Macke said.

Most people the girls have encountered are Kansans, with the ratio estimated 25 in-state persons for every one out-of-state person contacted. "We are feeling out different places in Kansas to find out eventually where permanent tourist information spots should be," Macke said.

Their itinerary is set for 10 weeks, visiting as many as two to three places each day in the eastern part of the state. Two other college students are promoting the attractions in western Kansas. With eight weeks left to travel, Macke and Grout feel the program is beneficial and that they have reached a lot of people.

"The job is like a summer paid vacation through Kansas with people, places, camping, motels and amusements," Grout said.

Daddy's not home anymore...

Hi—

My name is Darcy Lynn. I'm 5 years old. I live in Colorado with my Mom. We moved away from Daddy last year. I love my Daddy. Mom yells at me and spansks me whenever I ask her when I can see him again. I wish my Daddy would come and take me away from here. It's been quite awhile since I've seen him. I'll never forget what he said the last time I ever saw him. He said, "I love you, sweetheart, and I always will. As soon as possible we will be together again." He told me to pray every night before I went to bed because God loves us both.

Tina is my neighbor, who goes to church with a friend from Big Sisters. She doesn't know what church is, but she told me that someone named Jesus lives there.

I do not feel happy very often. I want my Daddy, but Mom says I can't. I wish I had a friend I could talk to. My Mom says I don't need a friend. Will you be my friend?

Your Friend,
Darcy Lynn

KENT, Ohio — A county judge on Monday ordered demonstrators evicted — and university construction plans delayed temporarily — at a site near the spot where four Kent State University students were shot to death seven years ago by National Guardsmen.

The ruling, if observed, would take the dispute from the hilltop from which the guardsmen fired and would leave its resolution in a more orderly setting — a court of law.

The demonstrators have been occupying the site for 61 days in attempts to prevent the university from building a gymnasium annex.

The university went to court Monday in attempts to get the protestors evicted.

WASHINGTON — The National Security Council is coordinating a study of how the United States can help meet basic human needs around the globe as a complement to the Carter administration's human rights campaign.

The study will be presented to President Carter during the last week of July, said one government official working on it.

He said the focus on providing such basic human needs as food, clean water, good health and education to some of the world's poorest people is seen by the administration as a natural complement to its human rights campaign.

The study is being prepared by representatives of the departments of State, Treasury and Defense, the Office of Management and Budget and the Central Intelligence Agency. The National Security Council, under the President's security adviser, Zbigniew Brzezinski, is directing the project.

TOPEKA — Weather permitting, the 1977 Kansas wheat harvest should be virtually complete by the end of this week, the Kansas Crop and Livestock Reporting Service said Monday.

Cutting of the crop was reported to be 85 per cent finished by last Saturday, which is somewhat ahead of last year and the 10-year average for the date of 80 per cent.

Reports of extremely weedy fields which slowed combining were numerous from all over the state, the weekly summary of crop conditions said.

ANCHORAGE — Interior Secretary Cecil Andrus ordered Monday that movement of oil through the trans-Alaska pipeline remain halted until he makes sure there is no danger of another explosion.

A blast and fire at Pump Station No. 8 killed one person and injured five others last Friday, apparently when oil leaked into the pumphouse and ignited.

Andrus said in Washington on Monday that oil flow "startup will not be permitted until it appears that the causes of this incident are not present in other sections of the system."

He directed Jack Turner, head of the department's Alaska Pipeline Office, to prepare a preliminary report before oil flow is resumed and a detailed report within two weeks after resumption.

In Anchorage on Monday, Turner said he doubts oil movement can resume until "sometime next week."

CHICAGO Jorge Orta doubled home two runs in the first inning and scored on a sacrifice fly by Chet Lemon and Francisco Barrios hurled a strong six-hitter Monday night to lead the first-place Chicago White Sox to a 4-2 victory over the Kansas City Royals.

Barrios posted his sixth consecutive triumph to boost his record to 9-3. He struck out 10 and walked three in hurling the White Sox to their 10th victory in the last 11 games.

Campus artwork originates from former art projects

By EDMUNDE JEKAM
Collegian Reporter

Scattered around campus is a great variety of contemporary art, ranging from painted benches to imposing sculptures.

Often this art is taken for granted, but people familiar with the campus prior to the summer of 1969 say it has enhanced K-State's appearance. Most are products of the Art in Situation workshop conducted during the summers of 1969 to 1970 and funded by the Educational Laboratories of the Ford Foundation and the University.

According to John Vogt, professor of art and sculpture and co-director of the workshop, the program was organized to give advanced students in art, architecture and landscape architecture an opportunity to gain practical experience working as a team in a real life situation. Students from several universities participated.

"They were able to undertake projects they wouldn't be involved with in the classroom," Vogt said.

PROPOSALS for projects were made by individual students. These proposals were then screened and some were approved for implementation by a committee composed of University administrators, members of the workshop and faculty. Vogt said designs had to be practical and aesthetically appealing, taking the buildings and sidewalks into consideration.

Some of the art served to solve environmental problems.

Vogt said the "KSU" sculpture on the corner of Anerson and N 17th St. replaced an "awful" sign and a fence that came right up to the corner.

"That 'KSU' is a vast improvement there," he said.

Also, the fountain in the Farrell Library plaza was designed to alleviate a drainage problem.

OTHER PRODUCTS of the workshop are a laminated fork north of King Hall, the children's playground near Justin Hall and the steel structure east of the president's residence.

The trend in art appreciation has changed through the years.

"For some years there was a real fear of putting up things that weren't traditional," Vogt said. "Exposure of people to art and the emphasis of art in school has widened acceptance of contemporary art."

VOGT said today's artists and architects collaborate during the designing of a building and artwork is made an integral part of the building. There has not been much new art on campus since the Art in Situation workshop due to a lack of finance.

"Our main concern is giving the students the opportunity to develop their own skills and artistic temperaments to a point where they can perform as professionals. If in the process something very good is made we put it up," he said.

The University reserves the right to retain samples of art students' works, particularly on the graduate level.

"We exercise some caution on that, because if a student spends a lot of money and time on something we won't feel right about keeping it," Vogt said.

Also, he said there is a need for a larger permanent gallery for art display.

"We have the gallery in the Union, and we are thankful for it, but it is too small," he said.

McCain auditorium is sometimes utilized as a gallery, but inadequate security makes it risky to display expensive artwork there, Vogt said.

Bicyclists must obey laws, too

Many bicyclists do not know the laws governing bicycle riding or they choose to ignore them. Bicycles are flagrantly ridden on campus sidewalks and across the lawns.

According to law, bicycles are to be ridden in the street, on the far right side and must be moving the same direction as the traffic.

Bicyclists must also stop at stop signs and for red lights. Signals are required for any cyclist making a turn or coming to a stop.

The laws which apply to automobile drivers also apply to bicyclists.

UNFORTUNATELY, many cyclists on this campus believe they have the right of way at all times, like a pedestrian. This is not the case. The bicycle rider must yield to pedestrians as well as cars, if the automobile has the right of way.

Stop signs and red lights are perhaps the most ignored of all traffic laws by the bicyclist and it is easy to see why. The cyclist must stop, losing his momentum, when he comes to a stop sign. It is much easier to cruise through the intersection with only a glance in either direction.

The increasing number of auto-bicycle accidents has loudly been blamed on the driver of the auto, but often, it is the cyclist who is at fault.

Cyclists should show the same respect to motorists that they expect motorists to show them.

Ignoring the traffic laws is only a means to increase the number of accidents.

Cycling is fun and is reliable transportation but as with all modes of transportation, should be tempered with respect for the law and courtesy to others.

Death of a newspaper

One of journalism's boldest and most innovative experiments succumbed last week to the economic crunch and went out of business as the best feature newspaper in the country.

The National Observer, after 15 years as journalism's outstanding weekly, printed its last issue July 11. It will be sorely missed by countless readers who have grown to rely on it for its refreshing perspective and comment on everything of importance to Americans.

The Observer, popular for insightful stories, imaginative artwork, comments on world and domestic affairs and even for its formidable crossword puzzles, was fighting an upward economic battle.

ITS PUBLISHERS, Dow Jones & Co., Inc., informed The Observer's staff that, despite a high subscription renewal rate, postal rates and expensive subscription solicitations the paper was forced to fold.

Readers were informed on the front page of the last issue why the paper went under, and were thanked for their loyalty and support during the Observer's 15 years.

But the departure of the Observer from American newsstands leaves a void in journalism which, if not filled by a comparable paper, will leave the American newspaper business with a gaping hole in its side.

THE OBSERVER was anything but a typical newspaper.

If left the day-to-day news to the big metropolitan dailies and carved a niche of its own. As a weekly, the Observer dissected important news items and looked at them in a new way — how they affected each American. It accomplished a feat which dailies, under pressures of time and total objectivity, couldn't accomplish.

The final issue was typical. Features on rehabilitating criminals, a policeman's union, drugs and football, air bags in cars and how what you call a grocery bag will tell others where you're from were included.

The Observer interpreted the late 1960s, turbulent as well as colorful, as no other paper or magazine could.

COMPRISED of a small, hard-working staff, the Observer stepped out in the same classy style it arrived with. It even featured the colorful gonzo journalist, Hunter Thompson.

Most important for the field of journalism is that the Observer actually worked. It was a paper owned by the same company that publishes the Wall Street Journal, with an editorial staff of 50, and a goal to provide something extra to Americans.

It epitomized what is now called "new journalism." Willing to take irreverent stands on subjects considered taboo, the Observer proved American journalism doesn't all come from press conferences, police blotters and confidential sources. It allowed for creativity in the modern newspaper.

It began in 1961 looking like other papers, with six columns and five or six stories on the front page. It ended in 1977 a product of graphic innovation, with fancy artwork, wide columns and only two or three stories on the front. But the style and direction of the paper changed little.

It will be hard to get along without the National Observer.

I will miss the Post Scripts, the crosswords I could only begin, the articles for consumers, the obscure but interesting ads, and the stories which supplement and enhance the hard news we are confronted with daily.

If all goes well, something will come along to do what the Observer did for 15 years — explore. But it's a shame the rich talent and journalistic ability which made up the entire Observer staff is now parting ways, because such an effort may never be seen again.

Grant us freedom from Mondays

We, as Americans, probably have more freedoms than the citizens of any other country. We can speak freely about any issue, worship in any church of our choice; we can think whatever we wish to think and we are entitled to the pursuit of happiness.

Entwined in the pursuit of happiness, in this writer's opinion, is the freedom from Mondays.

Monday, the day which begins the work week, follows Sunday (which is poor timing) the day of rest and relaxation. Therefore, it is supposed to be the day we all gather energy and strength for the week ahead of us.

BUT, Mondays are notoriously bad days. Something always seems to go wrong.

It wasn't until about a year ago that I noticed how bad Mondays could really be. Up until that time, I considered Monday about the same as any other day.

Then, it started. Monday became the day of disorganization, the day when something would certainly go wrong.

Like a self-fulfilling prophecy, my Mondays during the past year have been, if not disastrous, at least highly irritating.

For example, during fall and spring semester last year, I missed more Monday morning classes than on any other day, primarily because my alarm clock has an aversion to ringing on Monday morning.

MONDAY seems to be the day I become more uncoordinated than usual and I often end the day with at least one bruise on each arm and leg and twice, on Mondays, I've ended the day in the doctor's office.

This past Monday (thank heavens it is over), I blew a fuse in my house, caught the dog chewing a slipper, my hair-dryer exploded and my car ran out of gas. . . all before 10:30 in the morning!

There must be something which can be done to eliminate Monday. It might help to change the name. . . say to Wattday or "the day after Sunday." There seems to be a stigma attached to the name "Monday."

Maybe we should forget Monday altogether and begin the week with Tuesday, although after a while Tuesday would become mired with Monday's stigmas.

Sigh. Perhaps Monday is the day I should just stay in bed with the covers pulled tightly over my head.

The Collegian welcomes letters from readers.

Letters may be submitted (preferably typed) in Kedzie 103 or the editorial desk in the newsroom.

Traffic laws apply to bicycles

With summer comes the rise of bicycle, motorcycle and motorized bicycle sales.

Many bicyclists are unaware of their rules of the road. Manhattan uses the standard traffic ordinance of the Kansas cities, State Statute 12-1200-3009-3002.

Bicycles, as defined by the state, are propelled by human power and have two wheels at least 14 inches in diameter. Traffic laws apply to persons riding bicycles. Each person riding a bicycle shall be granted all the rights of a vehicle and have to ride their bicycles with the same care as they would drive a car.

THE STATE of Kansas imposes several requirements on bicyclists. They must make sure there is a light or reflector in the front and rear of the bike, and they must keep to the right of the road and ride no more than two abreast.

They must also give hand signals at any location when changing direction, never weave in and out of traffic or swerve from side to side and be licensed by the city of Manhattan through the fire department.

"We enforce bicycle violation with the same vigor as auto violations," a police department spokesman said.

"We're (Riley County Police) going to have a lot of violations with Mopeds," he said.

"Salesmen tell buyers that Mopeds are like bicycles. This is misleading. Mopeds are considered motorcycles by the state statute 8-13-49a."

CONTRARY to advertisements, Mopeds have up to one and one-half horse power and 50 cubic centimeters with a speed up to 25 m.p.h., which constitutes a motorcycle by the state.

"Mopeds are subject to all laws applicable to motorcycles, including tags, registration and front and rear lights. The operator must be 14-years-old with a class 'C' license which permits the operation of motorized bicycles," he said.

"They're restricted from some areas because of the speed limits. Moped's maximum speed is 25 m.p.h., and on many roadways the minimum is 40 m.p.h.," he said.

"Juveniles can be issued tickets for bicycle violations under the age of 14 and operators of Mopeds can be convicted of driving under the influence of alcohol," he said.

Motorcycles are defined by the state as having two or three wheels. All laws that apply to cars are applicable to motorcycles, with the exception of having doors, windshields and wipers.

Helmets are very important to motorcycle safety. Even with the best care, manufacturers suggest replacement of regularly used helmets every two years, according to the Safety Zone Newsletter of American Honda.

Buffalo herd still roams at U.S. Cavalry Museum

By RICK SEITZ
Collegian Reporter

The U.S. Cavalry Museum at Fort Riley has many exhibits depicting the history of the U.S. Cavalry and the events involved in the westward expansion of the U.S., but one of the most interesting "artifacts" isn't displayed behind a glass case—a herd of buffalo.

"We received the buffalo in 1957 from Fort Carson, Colo.," said Michael Vice, curator of the U.S. Cavalry Museum. "The purpose of this museum is to give people an idea of the history of Fort Riley and the cavalry. The buffalo are an important part of that history."

"The funding for the feed from the herd comes from the museum," Vice said. "The responsibility for the care of the herd belongs to the Post veterinarians." Vice said feed for the herd costs about $800 a year.

"We don't let the herd get over 25," said Capt. Deland Barr, chief of the animal disease prevention and control facility. "If the herd does get that high we'll give some away to other government agencies or groups that want to start a herd."

"Right now we have about 15 buffalo in the herd," he said. "Manhattan's Sunset Zoo wants one, but we can't give them one until the herd gets bigger."

BARR said a cross section of the herd is kept in the Buffalo Corral for people to view. The rest of the herd grazes on two pastures in the northern part of the Fort. One of the pastures is an ammunition dump. Barr said the ammunition is kept in bunkers partially underground and grass is allowed to grow over the tops of the bunkers.

"The people who control the ammo dump wanted the grass cut but it is really tough to mow," Barr said. "So, to solve the problem, we just let the buffalo graze in the ammo dump. They do a great job of keeping the grass cut."

Barr said one of the biggest problems with the buffalo is working with them.

"Buffalo are highly excitable animals and extremely susceptible to stress," Barr said. "You have to be real careful when working with them. If you get them too worked up they might fall over and die." In the two years Barr has been at Fort Riley, two buffalo have died due to stress.

EVEN THOUGH no one has been killed, wild stories about the buffalo surface from time to time.

"Of all the buffalo in the herd, Sinbad is probably the best known," Barr said. "He has quite a reputation." Sinbad is an 18-year old bull with one horn missing.

"He is no longer the leader of the herd, but I still don't want to mess with him," Barr said. "He has racked up a few army vehicles in his time."

"People will ask me if it is true that Sinbad killed five people and others will try to touch Sinbad so they can tell their friends they touched Sinbad and lived."

Barr said he doesn't worry about people going out to the pasture and getting hurt by the buffalo.

"There is more danger of getting shot by guards of the ammo dump than there is of getting hurt by the buffalo," he said.

Professor reminisces about K-State

Everything changes. Everyone knows that. But few have seen the changes A. E. White has seen on

K-State receives grant from HEW

The Department of Health, Education and Welfare's Office of Education has awarded $950 million to colleges, universities and post-secondary vocational schools for student aid during the 1977-78 academic year.

K-State has been awarded $437,550 for the National Direct Student Loan program; $334,231 for College Work-study; $34,750 for Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grants (SEOG) and $59,905 for renewal of SEOGs, according to Mike Novak, director of Student Financial Assistance.

Home Ec students do extension work

By DEBBIE BURKLUND
Collegian Reporter

Students in home economics can receive professional experience in extension during the summer.

This year, five juniors majoring in home economics from across Kansas are working in various counties as interns for seven weeks. K-State has two junior assistants. Marsha Hagenmaier, junior in home economics education, is working in Osage County and Christine Chestnut, junior in home economics extension, is in Douglas County.

In order to be a junior assistant, a student must be pursuing a degree in home economics and attending a Kansas college.

They get a good background of extension services, Hagenmaier said. Rather than working under the county extension home economists, students are considered co-workers. These students work with local program processes, Hagenmaier said, and each year the junior assistants set up a plan of work with five general goals.

"I have to initiate and entail a program of my own," Hagenmaier said. This includes planning, implementing and evaluating the program. She has been involved with a "Lunch 'n Learn" program which was set up in Osage County for working people who, because of work conflicts, associate little with the extension service.

Chestnut has been involved in planning a charm school in Douglas County. She is also helping plan a style review, a tour to Oklahoma this fall and a baby sitting clinic. She has attended a fair judge training meeting and a junior leader club picnic.

The junior assistants look at the people of the county and see where the problems are, Hagenmaier said. They look at statistics, ages, income levels, occupations and whether the problems are rural or urban. The assistants also attend meetings and clinics, help present programs, formulate projects and write evaluations, she said.

Fort Hays State University, Kansas Wesleyan University and Sterling College also have junior assistants working in Kansas counties this summer.

the K-State campus and in Manhattan.

White is one of the oldest living members of the K-State emeritus faculty. He served as chairman of the scheduling committee for 35 years. During his 96 years, he has seen K-State and Manhattan grow together.

When he came to K-State in 1909, White originally planned to teach only a couple of years before returning to his native Indiana where he previously taught in high school. But instead of returning to Indiana after two years, he remained in Manhattan for 68 years.

White has seen K-State change in many ways in the past 70 years. In the area of energy, White has seen the University run the gamut. K-State is now considering coal as a future energy source, but when White first appeared on the campus in the early 1900s, the only source of energy for the school was coal.

WHITE described in detail the process of delivering the coal. He said two horse-drawn coal carts were hauled up Bluemont Ave. twice a day from the Blue Valley Railroad to the old furnaces located where the engineering shops now stand.

"Once on campus the coal had to be shoveled off the carts by hand. Since each cart carried two tons of coal, it was quite a job to unload it," White said. Burning that much coal creates quite a refuse problem, according to White.

After the coal was burned the cinders and ashes were raked out of the furnaces and shoveled into wheelbarrows and wheeled to a cinder pile located where the east part of the K-State Union now stands, White said. White recalled a cinder pile 60 to 65 feet high when he first came to K-State.

White has seen collegiate sports grow from infancy. He recalls football games being played on a vacant lot where Bluemont school now stands.

White also remembers the beginnings of the old stadium.

"One day, President H. J. Waters declared a holiday. He rounded up a lot of shovels and scrapers and two or three teams and students and others leveled off where the old stadium is now located," White said.

WHITE also said the city of Manhattan has changed a great deal in the past 68 years. In an expanding city where apartment complexes abound and new ones seem to be going up daily, it's hard to imagine Manhattan as White saw it for the first time in 1909.

"There was only one boarding house in town when I first came. It was where Brewer Motors is located on Poyntz Ave. Denison St. was the city limits in 1914," White said.

Although White retired from teaching at K-State in 1949, he remained semi-active in the teaching field for the next 10 years. He filled in a vacancy in the mathematics department at Hastings College for a semester after the death of one of their instructors. He later taught for two years at William Penn College in Iowa. His last teaching assignment was in 1959 at the age of 80.

White still keeps fairly active. His daughter, Mary Frances, an associate professor of English at K-State who still lives with him, said her father does their laundry and still pays his own bills and keeps his own checkbook.

The Whites — father and daughter — eat out every night, so they are regulars at several places. They have made quite a few friends at the restaurants in town and a couple of his favorite restaurants bake birthday cakes for him. For his last birthday, some friends gave White a McDonald's hat and T-shirt, and he wore these at a recent neighborhood picnic.

Just because he's nearing 100 is no reason to grow inactive, White believes. He still is seen at city and University events and on Sunday mornings he'll be at the First United Presbyterian Church in the fourth row.

Cage stars train through summer

By TOM FAULKNER

Collegian Reporter

If you walk into Ahearn Field House or the gymnasium sometime this summer, you're bound to find all kinds of people.

But there will be one group of young men who many students, faculty and Manhattan residents have seen at one time or another — members of the K-State basketball team.

Steve Soldner, junior forward-center, said he is going to summer school and not working.

"I'm taking six hours this summer to help me graduate sooner," the Farina, Ill., native said.

DURING the season, the team misses a lot of class due to road trips, but making up lost class time isn't difficult.

"If tests come from the text books you're okay," Soldner said, "but if the exam is straight from lecture it's a little harder, because someone always has to take notes for you." According to Soldner he plays basketball two hours a day, six days a week, but that is not all.

"On Monday, Wednesday and Friday I lift weights from 6 p.m. to 7 p.m., and on Tuesday and Thursday I run and work with the ball toss-back machine before playing," he said. As for next season, Soldner is confident about the Wildcats chances.

"We can pick up where we left off, even though we lost a lot through graduation," Soldner said. "Our recruits have been impressive so far and I know that Coach Hartman will be able to turn them into good college players. As for myself, I'm going to concentrate on playing better defense and improving my quickness."

THE BIG EIGHT'S Most Valuable Player, Mike Evans, is also making Manhattan his home for the summer.

"I'm enrolled in business policy this summer, working at Mr. K's and playing lots of basketball," Evans said. "This is my last year and I want to be in top physical shape before the season starts."

"To get in prime form, I work with a bullworker for isometrics and swim every day to strengthen the joints in my ankles," he said.

"I know there is room for improvement and I want to make the improvement early in the year, not at the end," Evans said. "I want to be at my peak at the start and sustain it through the whole season."

Sports

OPTIMISM and winning has always been a long standing tradition with K-State basketball. According to Evans, the '77-'78 basketball season will be no exception. Because of the loss of Dassie, Winston and Droge, he said the coming season must be approached with great optimism.

"Hopefully our recruits can make the transition from high school to college basketball, and if they can, then the future looks very good," Evans said.

When not in class, junior guard Keith Frazier spends his time on the track and basketball court.

"I need to improve my basketball skills," Frazier said. "I try and run at least two miles every day and then concentrate on fundamentals of passing and dribbling."

Like Soldner, Frazier also is impressed with the new cage recruits.

"They are working hard they will help us next year," Frazier said.

FORMER Manhattan High School star, Scott Langton, has devoted his summer to working out and playing basketball every day.

"As of now I am looking for a job, and I am not enrolled in summer school," Langton said.

"Four days a week I participate in the high school weight training program where I concentrate on lifting weights and agility drills."

"I go back over to the fieldhouse at 7 p.m. and scrimmage with the members of the team that are here," Langton said. "I don't have any specific workout on the weekend. I will stay home, do stretching exercises and play on my court for about an hour."

"I want to go in (next season) with the attitude of being able to contribute to a winning team and season," Langton said. "I don't want to get off on a bad foot and have to wait to start games until mid-season. I want to be able to start at the first of the season."

"Our recruits have potential to help us, but need more experience, that's why I am glad they are here, because they are getting acquainted with us as well as getting used to higher level competition," Langton said.

"They will definitely help K-State basketball in the coming years."

Howe transforms winning attitude toward coaching

By EUGENE PERKINS

Collegian Reporter

Assistant track coach Jerome Howe had a very simple reason for returning to Manhattan last fall after two years in Boulder, Colo. — K-State track.

"The K-State program has great tradition," Howe said. "It's a program I feel very strongly about and have positive feelings for."

Howe graduated from K-State in 1972 with a degree in psychology, after completing a highly successful collegiate track career. Howe won several Big Eight titles during his collegiate career, both individually and on relays. He won the national AAU 1500 meter title in 1972 with a time of 3:38.2 and also made the U.S. Olympic team as an alternate in 1972 and toured Europe.

"Making the Olympic team and touring Europe made four years of running worth it," Howe said.

HOWE was a member of the K-State distance medley relay team which set a world record in 1972. The record was since been bettered by a Villanova team, but because two members of the Villanova team were foreigners, the K-State time of 9:31.8 still stands as an American record.

Individually, Howe holds the school record in the three-mile run with a time of 13:29.3. He also holds the cross country record at six miles with a time of 28:43. Howe had a best on 3:59.3 in the open mile and clocked a 3:56.5 on a relay.

After graduating, Howe stayed at K-State for two years to get his masters in physical education. He also worked as a graduate assistant to former track coach Deloss Dodds during the 1973-74 academic year.

IN FEBRUARY of 1973 Howe signed to run protrack with the International Track Association (ITA). Howe said he gave only minor consideration to remaining an amateur and trying for the 1976 Olympics.

"I didn't think I would have the desire to train for four more years," Howe said. "Besides, after college you either become a running bum or you get a job and that makes it hard to train. By signing with the ITA, I could run competitively and still have some money coming in."

"If I had it all to do over I would sign for pro-track," Howe said. "It was a lot of fun and I was well-treated by the ITA management."

Howe said the thing he enjoyed most about pro track was traveling to cities where he hadn't been before. The list of cities Howe visited while with the pro tour includes San Francisco, Los Angeles, Boston, New York, Montreal and many others. He also went on tour to Japan, Edinburgh, Scotland and London.

THE FIRST SEASON of pro track was entirely indoors.

"I didn't care for it," Howe said. "I'm not a very good indoor runner." Still, Howe's first year on the tour was probably his best. He ran several 4:00 miles and was undefeated at two miles.

"I also beat Jim Ryun and Ben Jipcho a couple of times and that felt good," Howe said.

Howe moved to Boulder in August 1974 to live and train for the third year and Howe believes it must have helped as his third season was much better than the second. The highlight of the third season for Howe was breaking four minutes in the mile for the last time.

After retiring from professional track, Howe served as assistant track coach at the University of Colorado for the academic year 1975-76 before returning to K-State last fall.

Howe said he doesn't miss competitive running and feels very comfortable being a recreational runner.

"Sometimes when I watch a meet I wish I could be fit and run like I used to," Howe said, "but I feel relieved that I'm not competing and don't have to run 'X' number of miles a day anymore."

Nursing homes — free enterprise, government subsidies and regulations. Is there a way to balance the three?

Harold Russell, owner of Woodlawn Health Center, Inc., of Topeka said he believes private ownership of nursing homes is desirable, but that some governmental control is necessary.

"Federal regulations are necessary to prevent abuses," Russell said. "But whenever rules and regulations are enforced by one agency yet funded by another, the chances for inequity are increased."

The U.S. Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (SRS) is the main regulatory agency. Medicare and Medicaid are the funding agencies that reimburse nursing homes for their services to welfare patients through Titles 19 and 20.

Also regulating nursing homes, directly or indirectly, are the U.S. Department of Health and Environment, the State of Kansas Health Coordinating Council, the Federal Health Systems Agency, the state fire marshal, State Food Service and Lodging and federal audits.

JOAN RUSSELL, licensed nursing home administrator and vice-president of Kansas Professional Nursing Home Administrators Association (KPNHAA), agrees government regulations should accompany government money.

"Nursing homes would prefer that the state just adopt federal regulations instead of adding all their own variations," she said.

For example, she said federal guidelines state all nursing homes shall have "adequate staffing." State regulations require a fixed number of personnel at all times.

According to Russell, this doesn't allow for staff flexibility to meet the varying needs of the patients.

"We are required to staff like hospitals but we're paid like nursing homes," Mrs. Russell said.

NURSING HOMES are subject to both announced and unannounced inspections, although unannounced ones are more common, Mrs. Russell said.

"The inspections are needed but could be consolidated into fewer and more thorough ones," she said.

Donald Schmidt, president of KareFree Nursing Center, Inc. of Wichita, said of government regulations that if a staff-to-patient ratio is required then there should be no limit on the money nursing homes can spend on patients and still be reimbursed.

RECENT modifications in Title 19 medical services coverage will limit further psychiatric and psychological services, optical and dental services available to welfare patients.

Nursing homes are presently reimbursed for 75 per cent of the administrative, property, room and board and health care costs of welfare patients.

"It (reimbursement) should be at least at the 90th percentile," Schmidt said.

Mrs. Russell said it is the private patient who suffers in the long run. To make up for money lost from welfare care, the nursing homes charge more for the private paying patient.

Nursing homes are reimbursed $18.50 daily for welfare patients while private patients may pay from $18.50 to $28 daily to live in the same home.

"It's driving private patients out of nursing homes," Mr. Russell said. "Nursing homes are becoming more like nursing hospitals and are losing the home function they used to provide."

Carter approves neutron weapons

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Carter asked Congress Tuesday to approve spending to build neutron weapons, and the Senate moved toward a vote later this week on whether to permit production of the controversial new weapons system.

In a letter to Sen. John Stennis, D-Miss., Carter urged Congress to approve spending for producing the weapon, saying it is "in the nation's security interest."

The President told a news conference Tuesday, however, that he has not "decided whether to advocate deployment" of the bomb. Thus, Carter endorsed building the weapons but deferred any decision on whether to assign them to U.S. troops.

THE SENATE is to take up the issue of funding for the nuclear device Wednesday.

Critics attack neutron weapons as dangerous additions to the arms race.

Supporters say the weapons, which are designed to kill more by controlled radiation than by explosive power and heat, are needed to balance Eastern-bloc military forces in Europe.

The Pentagon wants the weapons for potential use by NATO forces who are far outnumbered by Soviet and East European tanks and troops.

CARTER said that if nuclear weapons were ever used in a conflict, the neutron warhead would result in much less destruction. At the same time, the President said he continues to advocate elimination of ownership of nuclear weapons by all nations.

In an interview before the Senate debate, Sen. Mark Hatfield, R-Ore., a leading opponent of the weapon, said he might try to block a vote with a filibuster.

Hatfield said there is new evidence that the neutron weapons, to be encased in artillery shells and Lance missiles warheads, would be a threat to civilian populations in war zone.

The senator said that far from being the so-called clean nuclear device described by its supporters, a neutron weapon could create "a gaseous cloud of radioactive chemicals which could kill thousands of people in its path before dissipating into the upper atmosphere and lingering for thousands of years."

IN BELGIUM, meanwhile, Gen. Alexander Haig Jr., the allied commander in Europe, said the military officials in NATO countries have given "enthusiastic support" to the introduction of neutron weapons.

He said if the Soviet Union knows neutron weapons are in the NATO arsenal, the chances for a land war in Europe are reduced. The exact amount of proposed funding for neutron warheads is classified. Before the July 4 recess, the Senate met in closed session for two hours of classified debate. After that, Hatfield narrowly lost an initial attempt for cutting off funds, but a new vote was scheduled for this week.

CARTER first disclosed his support for production of the neutron bomb in a letter to Sen. John Stennis, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

In his letter, Carter referred to the weapon as being "in the nation's security interests" and urged congressional approval of funding for the weapon.

But he said he was awaiting reports before deciding whether to deploy the weapon.

The Senate is to take up the issue of funding the weapons system on Wednesday.

Landon Lectures to feature Sen. Baker, Ambassador Black

United States Sen. Howard Baker (R-Tenn.) and Shirley Temple Black, former U.S. ambassador to Ghana, have agreed to appear at K-State as part of the Landon Lectures series for the next school year.

J. Robert Wilson, president of Landon Patrons, said in a letter seeking financial support for the program that, although appearance dates had not been set, Baker and Black had committed themselves for the 1977-78 school year.

The Landon Lectures Series is named after former Kansas governor and 1936 presidential candidate Alf Landon.

Wilson also said in his letter that there remained a possibility of President Jimmy Carter appearing here as part of the program. According to the letter, K-State presidential assistant Barry Flinchbaugh is still attempting to acquire a commitment from Carter.

Among other political figures the program hopes to bring to Manhattan next year are former President Gerald Ford, former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, and Edward Levi, former U.S. attorney general. Wilson also has hopes of attracting Henry Ford II and Forbes Magazine publisher Malcom Forbes.

Baker, who served as assistant to former Sen. Sam Ervin during the Senate Watergate investigation, is considered one of the Republican leaders for the 1980 presidential nomination.

Black, former child movie star, most recently served in the Ford administration as head of protocol.

'Warm' look dominates fall fashions

By NANCY DENNING
Collegian Reporter

The "warm" look will dominate K-State fashions this fall.

"Fashions for fall have definitely been influenced by the cold winter the United States experienced last year," said Mike Browne, buyer for Browne's department store.

"Sweaters are the biggest item this fall," said Cindy Hudson of Keller's department store. "You will see lots of coat sweaters."

Sweaters will be woven of shetland wool and fur blends instead of acrylics, Hudson said. The big knit type sweaters with the cowl necks and hoods will be the most popular.

"The layer look, a turtleneck with sweaters over them, are the 'in' look for fall," Browne said.

"Lots of peasant skirts, straight skirts and soft dirndls will be seen this fall," said Marcia Nolte, buyer for Carousel.

"Skirts will be below the knee and in the earth tones," said Ward Keller, owner of Keller's department store. "Grey has died down from last year as the predominate color."

BECAUSE OF the sundress influence this summer, fall fashion will feature the jumper, Nolte said.

"In dresses the romantic look versus the tailored basic look is of equal importance," she said. "Dresses are more toward the peasant, old romantic look."

Jeans are still the basic of the co-ed wardrobe, Browne said.

"Pants will be solid colors, but will not play a major role in the coed's wardrobe," Nolte said. "The emphasis will be in tops."

Nolte said. Two types of tops will predominate the fall scene, the conservative shetland wool or Harvard type and the novelty faddish look.

"Silk is the big look in blouses, but because it is so expensive the coed will probably buy poly-silk instead," Nolte said. Silk blouses will sell for about $90.

"There will be more full length, hooded blanket-type coats this fall," Hudson said.

"Coats will wrap and be loosely worn over the layer of sweaters," Browne said. "They will be the horse blanket style. Prints are the popular color. Ski-wear is still popular and fashionable."

"Polar guard" will be the most popular, Browne said. It is a "hi-loft" polyester which looks like down but is less expensive.

BOOTS WILL be dressy this fall, instead of the casual look of last year, Nolte said. They will be worn with everything from skirts and gauchos to dresses and coats.

"The leisure suit is out and the traditional look back in for the man on campus," said Bill Woodward, manager of Woody's Mens Shop. "The trends for this fall are a continuation of the last two years."

"Crew neck shetland sweaters and pleated slacks will be the basic college man's wardrobe," Woodward said.

SWEATERS WILL be cardigans and camel hair with crew or V-necks, said Jack Bishop of Sheaffer's Ltd.

"Flannel is the big news in men's shirts," Woodward said. "They will be tartans or small checks. They (shirts) will be good looking but not wild."

"For the 'warm' look a tweed blazer will be worn," Woodward said. "Dress suits will be the traditional look. There is more of a return to the pinstripe businessman suit."

"The wingtip shoe and revival of the tassel and penny loafer shoe will be seen this fall," Bishop said.

Due to the wool shortage in Europe, there will be a price increase in sweaters this fall, Woodward said.

"The big news in prices are in sportcoats and suits," Woodward said.

said. "Due to clothing and labor problems last spring, the clothing industry has gained an increase in salaries for their employees. What this means to the customer is a $10 increase in sportcoats and a $15 to $20 increase in suits."

Federal nursing home rules designed to prevent abuses

He said he believes homes for the elderly should be separate from the nursing function in order to better meet the emotional needs of the patients.

Concerning further state control and possibly ownership of nursing homes, Schmidt said he believes free enterprise and competition encourage better patient care.

The Russells and Schmidt saw Governor Robert Bennett's recent interest in and unannounced visits of nursing homes as positive.

"I would be more than happy to show him around," Mrs. Russell said. "If nursing homes use his visits wisely and make him aware of the problems nursing homes are facing, it could lead to more favorable nursing home legislation."

FALL... is on the way as Linda Hall and Steve Baxter, employees of area clothing stores, are dressed for fall in the latest fall fashions.

ROCKWOOD, Tenn. — A truck carrying highly toxic hydrogen bromide gas through the East Tennessee mountains crashed on an expressway Tuesday and spread a cloud of stinging fumes that prompted evacuation of this valley town's 5,259 residents.

At least 30 residents were treated at a hospital here, but administrator John Couch said none of the injuries was serious.

The truck's driver, a woman whose name was not known, died in the crash. Rockwood police identified the driver's husband as Robert Thompson, 42, of Longview, Tex., and said he was taken to a hospital where he was having trouble breathing.

WASHINGTON—His code of silence unbroken and his motives for the Watergate burglary still a mystery, G. Gordon Liddy won parole from prison Tuesday. The U.S. Parole Commission set his release for Sept. 7.

By then, the one time lawyer for Richard Nixon's re-election committee will have served 52 months in prison, more than two years longer than any of the other 24 men sentenced for Watergate and related crimes.

Liddy, whose planning and direction of the Watergate burglary set in motion the events that forced Nixon's resignation, must still pay his $40,000 fine or have it "otherwise disposed of according to law before release."

HELSINKI, Finland—An attempt by two young Soviet hijackers to use a dud grenade as a ticket to Sweden was foiled by sleep Tuesday and they faced quick extradition back to the Soviet Union.

The pair, identified as Alexander Zagirnyak, 19, and Genady Seluzhko, 22, walked separately off the empty Aeroflot jet, hands up, a few hours after they fell asleep and enabled their last three hostages to escape.

Officials said both were from Petrozavodsk, the capital of Soviet Karelia in northern Russia, and Seluzhko had a criminal record.

WASHINGTON—Three of the nation's former top tax collectors implored Congress Tuesday to take pity on citizens struggling with a complex tax code and baffling return forms.

Donald Alexander, IRS commissioner in the Ford administration, said the 1,000-page code contains "words of such a type and structured in such a way as to defy the understanding of all but the most skilled, dedicated and experienced tax practitioners."

WASHINGTON—Advocates and opponents of Laetrile agreed Tuesday to a winner-take-all clinical showdown to determine, once and for all, whether the substance fights cancer.

Both sides said they would abide by the results.

The uneasy compact was forged by Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., while chairing his Senate health and scientific research subcommittee hearing into Laetrile.

Kennedy pledged that if the government-conducted clinical tests prove Laetrile is effective as a cancer cure, he will lead a move in the Senate to legalize it.

Laetrile supporters promised in turn that if the tests prove the substance is not effective, they will stop publicly promoting it.

CHICAGO—Amos Otis drove in five runs with a two-run homer and bases-loaded triple and John Mayberry hit a towering homer Tuesday night to lead the Kansas City Royals to an 8-3 victory over the Chicago White Sox.

Dennis Leonard, 8-9, coasted to his ninth complete game behind the lusty attack, while Steve Stone, 9-7, took the loss.

Federal government may pay maternity medical expenses

WASHINGTON (AP)—The Carter administration proposed on Tuesday to pay the maternity expenses of pregnant women who choose to have their babies and give them up for adoption rather than seek abortions.

HEW Secretary Joseph Califano Jr., in describing an administration proposal to provide federal subsidies for adoption of hard-to-place children, called elements of the plan "obviously an alternative to abortion."

Both President Carter and the secretary of health, education and welfare oppose using federal funds to pay for abortions.

The adoption plan, similar to one already passed by the House and awaiting Senate action, eventually would cost more than a half billion dollars a year in federal subsidies to families and matching funds to states that improve their foster care programs.

Vice President Walter Mondale, sponsor of one subsidy bill in the Senate before he was elected vice president, outlined the administration plan at a briefing with Califano. He said the plan is designed to "strengthen, rather than undercut, the family."

CALIFANO said the proposal would provide "a couple of thousand dollars a year" to needy families that adopt traditionally hard-to-place children — those over two years old, children with mental or physical handicaps, minority group children and siblings who for one reason or another are deemed inseparable.

The present federally supported foster care program, Califano said in testimony prepared for the Senate, "is a classic example of a perverse incentive system" that is viciously antifamily.

He noted that the government now spends $171 million a year to help pay the expenses of children in foster homes but discourages foster parents from adopting the children by cutting off the payments — and in many states Medicaid eligibility — at the moment of adoption.

Federal foster care funds, which would be increased to more than $300 million by the mid-1980s, would be available in the form of adoption subsidies to families.

New tax on liquor raises retail prices

By SHEREE LOWE
Collegian Reporter

A visit to a liquor store will hold a surprise for the alcoholic beverage consumer. Prices have increased.

A new tax for alcoholic beverages went into effect in the state of Kansas on July 1.

"The reason this tax went into effect is the Governor removed the tax on prescription drugs, and to make up for this loss of revenue a gallonage tax was added to alcoholic beverages," said Bill Shutty, assistant state attorney general.

"The new tax is regulated by the state. They place the price on the alcohol when it is delivered to the wholesaler, who, in turn, adds an enforcement tax before selling the products to the retailers," said Donna Blevins, manager of Jackson's liquor store in Manhattan.

THE PERCENTAGE of tax differs according to the concentration of alcohol.

The increase, affecting spirits (such as scotch and bourbon), wine, liquors and beer varies from 10 cents on half pints to $1 on a gallon of liquor and spirits. Beer and wine prices rose only a few cents.

The revenue from this tax will go to a state general fund and to help the alcoholism program. The program includes Alcoholics Anonymous and the general rehabilitation of alcoholics.

Consumer agency; people's advocate

Bob Dole and his wife, Elizabeth, a Federal Trade Commissioner, recently debated the merits of the proposed Consumer Protection Act (CPA) and the Agency for Consumer Advocacy (ACA) which it would establish.

Mrs. Dole, speaking in a professional capacity, said the country needs the ACA to ensure the rights of consumers. The Senator, trying to make light of the agency, said America needs another layer of bureaucracy like Jimmy Carter needs another brother.

Opponents argue the country doesn't need to add to the cost of government by conjuring up a federal agency to protect the consumer. They say it's too expensive.

THEY'RE RIGHT, it will be expensive. Establishing an agency to champion the rights of American consumers will cost about a nickel per American. But it will be worth it.

So far, it has been up to private individuals and agencies such as Ralph Nader's group to act on behalf of the consumer.

None of the consumer organizations so far have federal money, most have been volunteer groups and all have been understaffed for their assigned task.

But they have been effective and have helped the consumer immensely. From revealing the Corvair to be unsafe to untangling complicated battles with polluters, these consumer groups have provided an important service to the country.

It's unfortunate that government has to become even more expensive to accommodate consumers, but if that's the nature of the bureaucratic beast, so be it.

It sounds good for the politician to cry foul and complain (obstreperously to his constituents) that he is trying to trim the federal budget. He can say the bureaucrats are for the ACA in order that they might breed more of their own kind.

But it's quite another thing when the goal of such an addition is to protect the consumer from fraud, unfair business practices and other wrongdoings constantly perpetrated upon the unwary consumer.

Sadly the consumer remains the biggest single group without representation in Washington.

The CPA would remedy just that and give the consumer a full-time spokesman in the federal system. The benefits of the proposed agency by far outweigh the expense; Congress should realize that, as the President already has, and give its full support to consumers.

Carter's human rights

The issue of human rights has become the focal point of President Carter's foreign policy. When he first took office, Carter emphasized the need for other countries' governments to provide its peoples human rights.

Carter declared countries who were denying their people basic human rights would not receive American aid or arms, or the amount of aid would be reduced until the people of the country were granted human rights.

Uruguay, Ethiopia and Paraguay were deleted from the aid list because the governments of those countries were not granting basic human rights to its citizens.

WHAT CARTER has failed to explain is his definition of human rights. Following American ideals, human rights can mean the right to free speech, free elections, free thought, free lifestyle, freedom from torture and freedom from oppression.

Human rights as defined by various churches and church groups could be defined as follows; The Unification Church may define human rights as freedom from family and the right to practice their unusual religion in any manner they wish.

The Mormon church may define human rights as the right to keep the family together and the right to keep women at home.

So, even within the borders of the U.S., we can find any number of definitions of human rights.

What happens when we extend the search for a definition beyond the U.S. boundaries?

The Soviet Union defines human rights as the right to have a job, the right to free medical care, the right to live in the Soviet Union.

MANY of the developing countries would define human rights as the right to eat and the right to have shelter.

But, Carter, in his pursuance of human rights, has been attempting to impose on other countries the American ideal of human rights. His definition of rights does not always correspond to the definition of foreign governments.

He is trying to force other nations to accept our views or be denied our money and friendship. This kind of thinking about foreign policy has been soundly criticized before when other Presidents attempted to do the same thing under a different banner.

But when Carter attaches a moral stigma to his attempt at telling other governments what they can and cannot do by labeling the issue human rights, he receives great applause from dissidents in the Soviet Union and receives applause from "moral" government leaders.

Carter's promotion of human rights should not be ridiculed, it should be praised. He is advocating the freedoms we hold dear.

However, the methods he is using to convey his human rights message can be likened to blackmail. By tying aid, trade and friendship to the human rights issue, Carter is, in essence, interfering in the sovereignty of other nations.

Carter should definitely speak out on the issue. For too long, the conditions of suffering which exist in some nations have been ignored.

Speaking out and interfering are two different approaches and for the good of our international policies, Carter should stick to speaking out.

News and more news

For those who missed last night's news, the Collegian is happy to repeat it for you.

A proposal to allow campus police to sleep while on duty was defeated last night because three policemen fell asleep during the vote.

A spokesman for the law enforcers said a new vote would be rescheduled when the policemen could stay awake long enough to cast their votes.

The Intercollegiate Athletic Council Monday issued a report disclosing that the artificial turf at the football stadium is becoming unglued.

A suggestion at the meeting was that after the field was glued, perhaps a little epoxy could be applied to the football team to help them from falling apart next season.

THE ROSE garden, for months in limbo over a site for a new home, has apparently found a place to settle its roots.

The garden is reportedly being moved to the center of the intramural football fields, north of the Washburn complex.

Next year's intramural football championships have been renamed from the Super Bowl to, you guessed it, the Rose Bowl.

And speaking of the Washburn area, the SGA announced Tuesday that tokens will be available for purchase at the new recreation complex to be built at Washburn.

The tokens will be applicable for the bus that is expected to take sports minded students and faculty to the complex.

Foreign students and minorities may also use the tokens to ride the bus to the new international student center located west of Moore Hall.

The K-State Union announced Monday that it has purchased two neon signs which will be used to distinguish the Student Governing Association office from the gate bins. The cost of the signs is $2,000.

K-State professor to attend national endowment seminar

William Evans, assistant professor of English, was selected as one of more than 1,200 participants in the National Endowment for the Humanities' Summer Seminar for College Teachers.

Evans is attending a seminar entitled "The Historical and Theoretical Development of Religious Studies," being held at the University of California at Santa Barbara.

The summer seminar provides opportunities for college faculty in undergraduate and two-year colleges to work in their areas of interest under the direction of a distinguished scholar in their field. The instructors also have the resources of a library suitable for advanced studies available to them. There are over 100 different seminars this summer and the participants come from each of the 50 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico.

THE SEMINARS are designed to sharpen the participants understanding of their field and improve their abilities to convey their knowledge to their students. The instructors attending the seminars complete seminar assignments and then pursue personal studies of their own choosing.

Each seminar has received a National Endowment for the Humanities grant averaging $44,000. Each participant in the seminars is given a stipend of $2,000 for a tenure period of two months.

The National Endowment for the Humanities is an independent agency of the Federal government that awards grants to support education, research and public activities in the humanities.

Adoptive parents outnumber children

Editors note: This is the first of a three-part story dealing with child adoption and foster care facilities.

By LISA CARMICHAEL
Staff Writer
and DEBBIE BURKLUND
Collegian Reporter

The demand for adopted children far exceeds the number of children available in Kansas. In March, there were more than 200 families in Kansas waiting to adopt the only 33 children available.

Most of the children available for adoption are now in foster homes. The courts have either severed the parents' rights to them or the parents have given up their children because of unusual circumstances. Infants available for adoption usually come from unwed parents and there are sibling groups available.

"The older children are often removed from their homes because of neglect or abuse," said Evelyn Middelstadt, a consultant volunteer for Kansas Council on Adoptable Children (KCOAC).

KCOAC helps get the families who want children together with the children who need homes. It tries to get foster children either back to their natural parents or into permanent homes.

MARRIED COUPLES are given priority over single people in the adoption procedure, although single persons have the right to apply, said Melanie Hawkinson, adoptive worker for the Manhattan Social Rehabilitation Services (SRS).

SRS has approved single people as adoptive parents since 1951, said Janice Waide, Adoption and Foster Care Specialist in Topeka.

"It takes a bit of persistence to show it (a single person's home) is a desirable home," said Carolyn Coates, who has adopted a child and helps others who have adopted or who want to adopt a child.

The worker has to have in mind what would happen to the child if something were to happen to a single parent, Hawkinson said.

"I think a single parent would probably be encouraged to take an older child or a hard-to-place child, one with a handicap," said Pauline Neel, social service supervisor.

AGE, SEX and race of the child are some of the questions the adoptive worker goes into with the adopting family.

"People want to adopt for several reasons," Coates said. "Some want to adopt because they can't have children of their own or because they want a child of a different sex. Others adopt because they are worried about the population explosion."

"Most people start out wanting a child something like themselves. However, newborn infants of a certain sex are difficult to come by, so eventually the people compromise to get a child," Coates said.

The broader the characteristics the parents put down on their application, the greater their chances are of receiving a child, Hawkinson said.

If parents can have their own children, their chances of adopting are slim, Neel said. However, there are some exceptions. Families where the mother or father may have had a child in a previous marriage but cannot conceive a child together would be one exception.

"The staff committees tend to lean towards childless couples. The needs of the children always come first," Waide said.

Prices at dormitories will increase this fall

The spiraling cost of living has caught up with K-Staters who are living or planning to live in a dormitory.

Campus housing will increase from $143 to $153 a month, or to $1200 from $1120 yearly, for the 1977-78 school year.

Electricity, food and workers' wages all have risen, said Thomas Frith, director of housing. The cost of room and board is set on a yearly basis and the only money housing receives is from payments made by residents. It's likely there will be another increase in the 1978-79 school year, Frith said.

"We are completely self-supporting. We don't get any tax subsidies," he said.

With the addition of Edwards Hall, there will be room for 4,500 residents in the dorms this fall.

There are a lot of people who do a lot to make it nice to live in the dorm, he said. Frith said he is confident the number of dorm residents will not decrease with the increase of dorm costs.

"They (residents) know that it's still a pretty good buy," he said.

Adults collect baseball cards too

By MIKE NOEL
Collegian Reporter

Ron and Marsha Koster are baseball fans. They have the baseball cards to prove it — 12,000 to 15,000 of them.

"I really don't know why I do it. I guess it's just because I'm interested in baseball," Ron said. "I guess it's just like stamp collecting or coin collecting. You do it just because you're interested in it."

Ron said he started the collection as a youngster when he would go to the drugstore every day to buy the cards in packs of gum. But even a true devotee to baseball cards would have a hard time accumulating 15,000 cards that way, so recently the Kosters have been adding to their collections at conventions that feature baseball cards for the collector.

"Last year we went to Kansas City and that's what really got us interested again," Ron said. According to Koster these conventions have as many as 1,000,000 cards on display for the public to buy and swap.

"At these conventions we just try to complete some of our sets and build up some of the others that we didn't have too much," Ron said. The Kosters recently have been buying complete sets. The sets consist of a card for nearly every player in the big leagues for a particular year and number about 660.

"During spring training, the Topps company, they're the ones who put out the cards, they go down and talk to the management and try to figure out which players are going to be in the big leagues that year. It's pretty close to the big league rosters," Ron said.

The Kosters also keep an eye out for garage sales, rummage sales and individuals who want to sell their cards. According to Marsha, a lot of bargains can be found in these places.

"These Hank Aaron cards we got for 10 cents each," Marsha said. "They were selling (at the convention) for a dollar each." The Kosters estimate they have invested about $1,000 in their collection. Because of bargains from garage sales and the like, they have no way of determining the value of their total collection.

Naturally, some cards are more valuable than others and, according to the Koster's, the Aaron cards are the most valuable ones. "Some of the old Hank Aaron cards would bring $10 or $12," Ron said.

The old Aaron cards sell so high because of their age, but more recent cards go for a higher than normal price also. Ron explained cards of normal players from 1976 sell for about eight cents each but the Aaron cards from that year are already going for 50 cents. According to Ron, the reason for the higher prices for the Aaron cards is "just because he's Hank Aaron."

Ron said the Aaron cards are worth more than the old Babe Ruth or Ty Cobb cards, although he admits they are still popular and scarce.

"Those cards are hard to come by. Kids want them a lot because it's a name they recognize," Ron said.

Baseball card collecting is a profession for some people but the Kosters have their collection for their own personal enjoyment. Filing 15,000 cards is quite a job, one that the Kosters haven't attempted yet.

"All we do is put them in shoe boxes or the box the set comes in. We don't really display them or anything," Ron admits. "We need to get some kind of system where we can look at them."

Ron is the former Luckey High basketball coach and both he and Marsha will be teaching next year in Summerfield.

Rec services plans policies to alleviate crowded courts

By MIKE NOEL
Collegian Reporter

Since tennis and raquetball have gained popularity in the past few years, crowded courts and people playing over their allotted one hour have plagued players at the University's Washburn Complex courts.

According to Recreational Services, those problems may soon be eliminated.

The rules of the University courts state students, faculty and staff have priorities over others. However, many students this summer have been complaining the courts are being used by military personnel and residents of Manhattan while they wait. People playing longer than the regular one hour period also pose problems.

The problems haven't gone unnoticed by Raydon Robel, director of Recreational Services.

"Basically it's a tough problem because a lot of people will not confront somebody else," Robel said. Robel said he hopes he has the solution to the problem with a device called the court coordinator. The coordinator is a board that holds a time clock and individual pockets for each of the handball and tennis courts.

"When you go on to a court, you take a card and stamp through a time clock and you know you have one hour worth of play. If you're in the waiting box you can tell by who stamped in, whose going to be finishing up on what court next," Robel said.

The new system will be based on mutual consideration. Robel said the only alternative to the coordinator would be continual supervision, a solution he is not in favor of because of financial reasons.

"I know of one school in California that's spending over $300 a week to provide supervision for their tennis courts," Robel said. "I'd rather see that money used to build more courts."

Robel said the court coordinator will help cure the problem of people hogging the courts. As far as keeping people off the courts who do not have priority, Robel said rec services is considering a rule to require K-State IDs to use the courts.

"We're going to try to come up with a rule to require ID checks to use the courts. If you don't have an ID card, then you're bumped," Robel said. He said the new system will be in operation by the fall semester.

Kent State police arrest parents of shooting victim

KENT, Ohio (AP)—The parents of a student killed during an anti-war demonstration at Kent State University on May 4, 1970, were among the first of more than 190 persons arrested Tuesday in a peaceful protest against plans for construction near the site of the shootings.

Sgt. John Peach of university police said 192 persons were taken into custody — with little resistance — after they defied a court order to leave a section of campus where the university plans to build a $6 million gymnasium annex.

Sarah and Martin Scheuer, parents of Sandy Lee Scheuer who was killed when National Guardsmen fired on the 1970 demonstration, were led away by police as the arrests began.

MRS. SCHEUER said she decided Tuesday morning to be arrested. "I don't want the gym built there," she said after being taken into custody.

The Scheuers' arrest was followed by that of Alan Canfora, who was wounded at the demonstration seven years ago.

"The campus police handled themselves admirably," said Canfora, standing outside the jail with his hands handcuffed behind his back. "I feel we learned a lot from seven years ago. Maybe my peers and friends don't understand...but this is a continuation of May 4, 1970."

Canfora, 23 at the time of the shootings, is now a member of the Barberton City Council and a vice president of the United Auto Workers.

MANY OF those arrested were part of a group who had camped — some since May 12 — on the construction site which is near where four students were killed and nine wounded when National Guardsmen fired into a crowd of protesters demonstrating against the Cambodian invasion ordered by then-President Richard Nixon.

The soldiers, called out by Gov. James Rhodes to quell the demonstrations in 1970, fired on the crowd for 13 seconds.

In the aftermath of the shooting, a criminal suit brought by the families of the students against the guardsmen was dismissed by a federal judge in 1974.

In a multimillion dollar civil suit, the National Guard, the individual guardsmen who fired the shots, Rhodes and the university were cleared of liability in 1975. That case is under appeal in the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati.

THESE ARRESTED Tuesday, including two in wheel chairs, were taken by bus and van to the county jail.

A university spokesman said most of the demonstrators would be charged with contempt of court and released on $25 bond.

A COLOR DOCUMENTARY FILM ETERNAL GLORY TO THE GREAT LEADER AND TEACHER CHAIRMAN MAO TSETUNG

— With English Subtitles —

ETERNAL GLORY TO CHAIRMAN MAO

by S.N. Hsu

When the mountains thunder the grim word, the quiet tears bathe the valley.

The passing of Chairman Mao Tsetung plunged the Chinese people and their friends into profound grief. Chairman Mao passed away on September 9, 1976, after having been their leader for more than a quarter of a century.

The documentary film "Eternal Glory to the Great Leader and Teacher Chairman Mao Tsetung", which will be shown today in the Union Little Theater at 8 p.m., recounts how the peasants, workers, soldiers, teachers, and students mourned with the deepest sorrow for the man who led them to obtain greater political power, to achieve a higher standard of living, and to work for a higher degree of social justice, economic equality, and political participation.

For seven days the Chinese people and their foreign guests went to Peking's Great Hall of the People to pay him last respects.

On September 18, one million people in the capital held a mass memorial meeting in Tien An Men Square. A memorial speech was delivered by Premier Hua Guo-feng. Mass memorial meetings were also held in other cities and villages. At 3 p.m., all the factories, mines, trains, freighters, and naval vessels throughout the country sounded the sirens in mourning.

The film ends by recalling scenes of Chairman Mao talking with peasants, workers, and children, giving a speech, and during festive occasions.

Nickle campaign advocates consumer protection agency

By LISA SANDMEYER
Collegian Reporter

The K-State Consumer Relations Board (CRB) became Manhattan's headquarters for a "nickel campaign" for the passage of the Consumer Protection Act of 1977, with the campaign kick-off on June 29.

The act would establish an independent, non-regulatory Agency for Consumer Advocacy (ACA) to speak for the interests of the consumer.

The purpose of the campaign is to persuade Second District Congresswoman Martha Keys to vote in favor of the bill. Keys is still undecided.

THE NATIONAL campaign was started by Congress Watch, one of the largest consumer groups in the United States. There are about 50 "swing-votes," or undecided votes, in Congress and Congress Watch is promoting the ACA by providing forms to which advocates of the act can attach a nickel to send to undecided representatives.

The agency is expected to cost taxpayers approximately $15 million per year, or about five cents per person. The forms say, "Here's my nickel; I want a consumer protection agency in the federal government."

THE ACT would allow the ACA to present data or other relevant information to federal agencies considering decisions affecting the interests of consumers. The ACA would have no legal power; it would act only as a spokesman for consumers.

The consumer protection bill never got moving in Congress last year because former President Ford threatened to veto it, said Brenda West, CRB director. President Carter supports the bill and Congress Watch hopes to have the bill before Congress before their August recess, West said.

Reading school stresses better skills, attitudes

By RICK SEITZ
Collegian Reporter

In the basement of Holton Hall, children between the first and eighth grades are going to school. They are attending the reading school, a six week school open since 1967.

"We emphasize a better reading attitude as well as reading skills in the school," said Leo Schell, professor of education and coordinator of the reading school. "We feel that if a child has a good attitude about reading he will want to read more and will develop reading skills much faster and easier."

There are 25 children attending the reading school. Most of them come from elementary schools in Manhattan and some from as far away as Paxico, Schell said.

"Teachers in the elementary schools recommend to us those children whose reading they feel can be improved," Schell said. "We send the parents an application and explain to them what the school is all about."

SHELL SAID a major part of determining the number of children the school can accept is the amount of tutors the school will have. All the tutors are graduate students in education and must enroll in the department's Clinical Practices in Reading class.

"In a sense the school is a lab," Schell said. "I see the tutors every day and we talk about what they are doing and how they can improve their teaching skills. We don't give any tests."

Schell said there is a list of about 20 things each tutor must do. Included in the list are visiting with the parents of the student, making a progress chart and giving certain tests.

The children attend the school from 9 a.m. to 10:15 a.m. five days a week. Each day begins with a period of silent reading.

GROUP READING sessions follow the silent sessions, then it's back to individual exercises.

"I really enjoy it and I'm learning a lot on how to interact with the kids more," said Roxan Tilley, graduate in education. "Your biggest challenge is keeping a lot of variety in the program so you can keep the children's attention longer."

K-Stater studies at East-West Center

Daniel Spare, a 1976 K-State graduate, is studying applications of irrigation and drainage to rice production in Honolulu, Hawaii, at the East-West Center.

"I saw some opportunities to assist in water management while there and wanted to work on it some more," Spare said.

About 1,500 people representing 40 nations work at the Center. It was established by Congress in 1960 to promote better cultural and technical exchanges between the U.S. and countries of Asia and the Pacific. Spare is working toward his master's in agricultural engineering.

Security, traffic officers guilty of sleeping on duty

By VELINA HOUSTON
News Editor

Two K-State Security and Traffic officers have been found guilty of sleeping on duty, according to Paul Young, vice president for university development.

Paul Nelson, director of Security and Traffic, was in charge of inspecting the records for detailed evidence of officers "cat-napping." Young would not release the two officers' names, stating it was more a personnel matter than a public one.

"We have investigated all leads provided concerning sleeping on the job and disciplinary action has been taken in all cases under civil service regulations," Young said.

"We have reiterated (to the officers) the policy or procedures for performance of patrol duty and we expect that everyone will be working in this fashion," he said. "Where an individual's performance is not in keeping with it, we will again take action."

One of the two officers elected to resign rather than face disciplinary action, according to Lee Tadtman, director of personnel services.

"The other officer was given three days leave without pay, suspension of duty," he said.

THE OFFICER who resigned told the Collegian he did so because he was asked to resign. He also said the suspended officer had been put on probation "three or four times before."

"This was his decision," Nelson said. "Nobody told him or coaxed him to resign, but I wasn't here when this took place. He had an alternative. He could have appealed but chose not to."

"Who told him to resign, I don't know," Tadtman said. "He came to me and indicated he would like to resign if we would accept his resignation and I said I certainly would."

Tadtman said that from the evidence personnel services had, the three-day suspension was sufficient discipline.

"The evidence was very meager as to the seriousness of the crime," he said. He also noted that, to his understanding, investigations were still being conducted by Nelson and the administration.

"As far as my end is concerned," Nelson said, "the investigation is over with."

Senate ratifies neutron bomb

WASHINGTON (AP)—The Senate voted Wednesday to give President Carter authority to go ahead with production of neutron weapons.

By a 58-38 vote, the Senate rejected a move led by Sen. Mark Hatfield, R-Ore., to cut funds for the warheads intended for use by NATO forces in Western Europe.

The voting was a victory for President Carter, who said Tuesday that while he has made no final decision on whether to add the weapons to the U.S. nuclear arsenal, they are needed in the national interest.

After voting to approve funding for neutron warheads, the Senate turned to a compromise proposal by Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., which would give the Senate authority to veto a production decision by the President.

THE VOTE came after the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hurriedly accepted an Arms Control Impact statement required by law before Congress could approve funding for any new entry to the U.S. nuclear arsenal.

Hatfield and other opponents say the weapons would give a president the false assurance that he could use them without prompting all-out nuclear war.

Installed on Lance missiles and artillery shells, they are designed to do more damage with concentrated radiation than with heat and explosive power and thus can be targeted more precisely, supporters say.

"This weapon system has no arms control advantages," said the analysis prepared by the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. At most, the report said the impact on arms talks "would be marginally negative."

THE REPORT said that to the extent that the Soviet Union or other Warsaw Pact nations were aware that neutron warheads would be used against them, an invasion of Western Europe becomes less likely and chances are reduced that a U.S. president would be called to decide to unleash nuclear weapons.

Sen. John Sparkman, D-Ala., chairman of the Foreign Relations panel, said the Senate should postpone any decision on the neutron warhead until Carter indicates clearly whether he wants it produced and deployed for potential use by NATO forces in Western Europe.

EVEN THOUGH Carter has urged Congress to approve money for building neutron weapons, he says he has made no final decision on building and deploying the weapons.

Supporters of producing the weapons say they are needed by NATO forces in Western Europe to offset the Warsaw Pact's greater troop and tank strength in the event of an attack.

Carter acknowledged at a news conference Tuesday that he was unaware warheads were about to go into production until the news stories.

If the Senate votes to provide funds for neutron weapons, Carter still could decide against producing or deploying them. If that happened, Carter could informally ask the Senate Appropriations Committee for its approval to spend the money elsewhere.

Sunbathers ignore dangers of excessive sun exposure

By DOUG HALL
Staff Writer

In 1500 B.C., early civilizations of India sang hymns of praise to the sun, the chief deity in their worship of nature. They offered sacrifices of food in exchange for its blessings.

In the 1970s, thousands of Americans again seek the blessings of the sun—this time in the form of its skin-darkening rays. The sacrifice they make, however, will come 10 or 20 years later in their lives, when they may face prematurely aged skin or skin cancer.

The incidence of skin cancer has increased dramatically since World War II, accompanying the increased popularity of sunbathing. A deeply-tanned body has become essential to the healthy, glamorous look. Pale skin is reserved for the chronically ill.

Dermatologists are unanimous in condemning the surge toward bronzed skin. There is no such thing as a "healthy tan," they say.

The American Medical Association stated last summer "about the only beneficial effects from suntanning are psychological."

DESPITE the warnings from doctors in dozens of magazine and newspaper articles each summer, beaches and pools are jammed with sunbathers. The Tuttle Cove and River Pond swimming areas north of Manhattan are no exception. Sun-seekers there are most often aware of the dangers associated with their day in the sun, but are not bothered by them.

"I'd be out here every day if it was possible," a K-State coed on the River Pond beach said. "I make it about two or three times a week. I don't worry about what might happen to my skin, because the idea of this is to forget your worries, isn't it?"

Only one sunbather admitted fearing the dangers of excessive sun.

"Last year I read a scare article in a magazine about how bad a suntan was, so I didn't try to get a tan all summer," she said. "This summer I'm back out again, because I didn't look good all pale. I still worry about it a little."

"I've got three swimsuits, and none of them has ever touched the water," another well-tanned student said. "Gees, if I worried

New York paralyzed by city-wide blackout

NEW YORK (AP)—Electric power was blacked out in much of the metropolitan New York area last night, throwing millions of persons into darkness.

The blackout knocked out power in most of New York City and upstate areas. Areas in New Jersey and Connecticut for the most part were not affected.

The blackout appeared similar to the one which 11 years ago darkened much of the nation's Eastern seaboard, but appeared to be on a smaller scale.

Clocks stopped last night at 9:34 EDT.

Police in New York City called all officers to work, and similar precautions were taken in other areas.

New Yorkers streamed from apartments and office buildings into darkened streets and traffic came to a standstill. There were glimmers of light in Manhattan skyscrapers which were able to turn on auxiliary power.

But at Shea Stadium in Queens, where thousands of fans were watching a National League baseball game between the Mets and Chicago Cubs, the lights went out.

Broadway theaters stopped performance as well.

Demand for power from air-conditioning units may have contributed to the problem, Con Ed officials said.

New York City's elaborate subway system was shut down, stranding passengers between stops. Police said evacuation measures were under way.

"It's a citywide blackout," said one police officer helping to evacuate passengers from one subway stop in midtown Manhattan.

A spokeswoman at the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey said Kennedy Airport was closed and all flights were diverted to Newark and Boston.

Region features many getaway spots

By MARY LOU PETER

Collegian Reporter

Manhattanites, like other Americans, sometimes find the grind of their job or schoolwork monotonous.

On such occasions there are many entertaining and educational spots that can be reached within a day's drive from Manhattan. Mini-vacations are popular these days.

"We have people coming in all the time looking for places to go just to get away for awhile," said Lynn Chester, travel consultant for the Kansas State Travel Agency. Travel agencies can assist the would-be traveler in finding lodging, prices and making reservations.

Omaha, Neb., during the horse racing season (through July 23 this year) is a popular quick-trip. Grand Island and Lincoln, Neb., also have racing and, due to their size, offer a variety of overnight accommodations and dining facilities.

The Capitol building of Kansas, is located one hour from Manhattan by car in Topeka. The building contains several murals painted by prominent artists. The Kansas State Historical Society, Gage Park and the zoo are also located in the capitol city.

A POPULAR place to go for a weekend, according to Chester, is the Kansas City area. Worlds of Fun charges an initial passport price at the gate and everything (rides, shows, etc.), is covered in that fee.

The Agricultural Hall of Fame is in Bonner Springs, just west of Kansas City.

The Missouri Ozark area, featuring the Lake of the Ozarks, can be reached in about five hours. The lake has 1,400 miles of shoreline and is popular for boating, fishing, swimming and water-skiing.

THE GRAND LAKE 'O the Cherokees in northeast Oklahoma is another area for fishing, water-skiing, swimming and boating. It has 1,300 miles of shoreline and is about five hours from Manhattan.

The Wichita area boasts not only extensive shopping and dining facilities but Century II, a unique cultural and civic center. Wichita also ranks first in production of personal airplanes. The Beech, Boeing, Cessna and Lear Jet plants have available tours.

Close to Wichita is Hutchinson, where the Kansas State Fair is held in September. It is also site of the world's largest salt mine and one of the world's largest and longest wheat elevators.

Dodge City, established in 1872, was known as "Queen of the Cow Towns." Today an authentic recreation of Front Street, complete with the Long Branch Saloon, is open to the public. Antique shops abound and Boot Hill is located there.

Six miles north of Canton, Kan., is the Maxwell State Game Preserve. One of the state's largest buffalo herds is there, along with elk, deer, beaver and other native animals.

HESSTON is the home of the Hesston Corporation, the largest manufacturer of farm machinery in Kansas. Also here is King's Antique Car Museum, containing more than 30 restored autos.

One of the world's largest freshwater fish hatcheries is located in Pratt along with a museum, aquarium and zoo.

Abilene, about an hour west of Manhattan, offers several points of interest. The Eisenhower Center, consisting of the family home, the Eisenhower museum, the Presidential library and the late President's grave, are located there. Old Abilene Town, a replica of Abilene during its cowtown days, is located south of the Eisenhower Center.

Across the street is the Greyhound Hall of Fame. Abilene is the home of several greyhound breeding farms and the National Coursing Meet of "world series" of greyhound racing is held there annually.

Just east of Salina is a prehistoric burial pit containing more than 140 skeletal remains of Indians, six feet tall or more, and a museum containing Indian artifacts.

The Brookville Hotel in Brookville (southwest of Salina) was built in 1870. Today it is famous for its fried chicken, home-made "fixin's" and old-fashioned atmosphere.

WASHINGTON—An American helicopter has been shot down over North Korea, the White House said Wednesday night. Press Secretary Jody Powell informed reporters of the incident.

The word was passed to the secretary of Defense by Zbigniew Brzezinski, national security adviser to President Carter at a state dinner for West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. Powell did not indicate whether Carter has been informed of the incident.

SAN QUENTIN, Calif.—San Quentin's 2,300 inmates were ordered locked in their cells Wednesday for an indefinite period, and an atmosphere of "tension and fear" was reported following fighting between Black Muslims and self-styled Nazis that left three dead.

"The situation will be evaluated daily but, for now, they are confined to their cells," Mike Luxford, acting prison information officer, said Wednesday. "The lockdown is prison-wide."

Three convicts were killed and five others injured in two separate incidents Tuesday in the stone fortress on San Francisco Bay. Luxford likened the prison hospital to a "battleground."

It was the third major racial incident in the past 10 years at the prison, Luxford said.

DETROIT—Defense attorneys say they will appeal the convictions of two nurses on charges of poisoning patients at a veterans hospital where more than 50 persons suffered breathing failures during a two-month period.

The jury that deliberated their case for nearly 94 hours also acquitted one of the defendants on a charge of murder.

Filipina Narciso and Leonora Perez were each convicted on three counts of poisoning patients. Miss Narciso was found innocent on one murder charge and one poisoning count. Both women also were convicted of conspiracy.

The two women face possible life imprisonment, but federal prosecutors said they had not decided whether to ask for life sentences.

WASHINGTON—Those free haircuts that once were one of the privileges of service in the U.S. Senate now cost $3.50. And senators now are being asked to drop such prerequisites as free shaving mugs, hairbrushes and combs.

The Senate Appropriations Committee approved without dissent on Wednesday a money bill that trims some, though not all, the benefits that go with service in the Senate.

The budget cuts, some of which also affect the House, enabled the committee to approve a bill that members hope will end use of the term, "Billion Dollar Congress," a reference to the size of the original budget request for the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1.

Call this one the "$991 Million Congress."

KANSAS CITY—Frank White slapped out four hits and keyed a four-run rally in the sixth to lead the Kansas City Royals past the Detroit Tigers last night, 6-4.

John Mayberry singled off Fernando Arroyo, 5-8, to place runners at the corners with one out in the sixth and set up Amos Otis' RBI single.

Doug Bird, 5-1, was the winner in relief. The Royals added a run on White's RBI single in the eighth.

The Tigers loaded the bases in the ninth with one out but managed only one run on Kemp's sacrifice fly.

Pigeons pose local problems

By SUSAN BURDEN
Collegian Reporter

Constant cooing and clucking is a common occurrence on the K-State campus. Pigeons flutter, fight and spread their droppings everywhere, making themselves a campus nuisance.

Bill Deam, administrator of the Riley County Health Department, said the pigeons of Manhattan present no real health problem.

"If a bunch of them fly over I'd probably not want to look up," Deam said.

Case Bonebrake, director of the physical plant, however, said the pigeon population on campus was a problem.

"We've attempted to control the pigeons because they are highly unhealthful besides being generally dirty and messy," he said.

PIGEON droppings, after accumulating in one area for a time, attract a fungus in the soil which thrives in the droppings. This fungus causes histoplasmosis, a respiratory disease.

"Histoplasmosis is a mold which collects in the lungs and grows until it literally chokes you off," said Gary Horacek, a sanitarian at Lafene Student Health Center. Signs of the disease are fever, anemia and emaciation. As of yet, no cases have been reported on campus.

HORACEK said the worst area for pigeon contamination on campus was around Fairchild Hall.

"There is an open air shaft at Fairchild and when it gets dark there are more pigeons than you can believe," he said.

BONEBRAKE said the worst places for pigeons seemed to be around Anderson, Weber, Willard, Fairchild, Farrell library and the Physical Plant.

"Pigeons are not native to this country and they have thrived because they don't have natural enemies," he said.

One method used for getting rid of the pigeons is by spreading a petroleum based jelly-like substance on their roosting areas. This doesn't get rid of the pigeons. It only moves them to another roost and the jelly washes off easily in the rain.

Another method is through a substance mixed with grain.

"It causes them to become excited and anxious. Pigeons are social birds, and their anxiety is transferred to other pigeons. This in turn causes them not to mate and to leave the area," Horacek said.

Poisoning can be used, but pesticides can be taken by the wrong animals so they are not often used.

ROBERT HENDERSON, extension specialist in wildlife damage control, said trapping was the best method of control.

"It's the most effective and the best way environmentally," he said. "Pigeons can be humanly carbon monoxidized."

"There is also a birth control pill for pigeons, but it's very expensive and is only effective for one year at a time," Henderson said.

Large cities are in trouble if they have a large pigeon problem.

"I was just in Washington, D.C., and the smell of the pigeon droppings was enough to knock you out. The temperature was near 100 degrees and there was no wind. It smelled like a chicken coop," Henderson said.

Abortion option

The Carter administration, reiterating its policy against abortion, has proposed yet another solution to cut down on the number of abortions.

Now, the Department of Health, Education and Welfare is sponsoring a proposal suggesting the federal government should pay for the maternity medical expenses of women willing to put their child up for adoption; an alternative to abortion.

Since it has been decided the federal government is not responsible for paying for abortions for socioeconomically deprived women, some solution needed to be tendered to resolve the problem of what to do with the unwanted children.

ON PAPER this plan may sound well and good and definitely morally correct to anti-abortionists, but the fallacy of the logic behind the program is staggering.

The program, if instituted, would cost taxpayers more than half a billion dollars per year. It seems odd that Carter, who claims we will have a balanced budget by 1980, would whole-heartedly support such an expensive program.

It isn't only the cost which is in question.

The entire moral issue of abortion is once again surfacing.

There may be many women who do not want to carry a child for nine months. For many underprivileged women, pregnancy means the loss of a much-needed job. They cannot afford to carry the child, no matter how much of their maternity expenses the government offers to pay.

A woman who desired an abortion for this or any other personal reason would then be forced to seek "back-alley" abortionists, thereby endangering her health.

Despite the moralizing of President Carter and other top government officials, abortions will not simply cease because the government offers to pay expenses. Abortions have been around for a long, long time and will continue. No amount of legislation will change that fact.

The neutron bomb vs. logic

Jimmy Carter urged Congress Tuesday to approve funding for production of the neutron bomb, one of the deadliest and most brutal weapons so far devised by man.

In approving the weapon, however, Carter admitted he is undecided whether it should be used, but said it should be "one of our options."

Nevertheless, he believes the enhanced radiation warhead, as it's euphemistically termed by experts, should be among the United States' arsenal.

The bomb is designed to annihilate life through lethal doses of radiation within a smaller area than that of conventional atomic weapons but leave buildings and other structures standing.

IT'S COMFORTING to know we're getting our priorities straight.

Death by radiation as described by experts is agonizing. Some victims will live up to two weeks, but most will die shortly after the blast. All of the deaths are very painful and ugly.

But the Pentagon—the country's euphemism factory—says the bomb will work like a cookie cutter, accurately carving paths through which "friendly" forces can move closer to the enemy. The radiation can also penetrate the heretofore unpenetrable Soviet tanks.

Can there ever be such a thing as a limited nuclear war, for which this weapon is designed? And would such a war be limited to Europe?

If such a calamity should happen, would the Russians, not having such a weapon, not reply to an attack with larger, more conventional nuclear weapons?

These questions remain unanswered, but it's likely the use of such a weapon would rapidly grow to an all-out battle and the United States would not limit such a battle to cookie cutters.

THE DEVELOPMENTS of the bomb and its

"Alright."

Ah yes, the life of a bartender. Sounds like fun doesn't it? Well, there is a lot more to the job than just pouring beer.

Have you ever thought of what a bartender does to get ready for people who patronize his establishment? Or what about when patrons leave and what he has to do before he gets to go home?

"Say bud, can you go to the bar and get these two pitchers refilled and also how about four Pepsi's this time?"

"Sure, I'll be right back."

"Hey you, I need a bar rag, you have one?"

"No, but I'll bring one back for you."

Sounds familiar doesn't it?

BESIDES pouring beer, the bartender's main job is to make sure the customer is happy, and to do that he has to be ready for anything. Things like clearing up tables, emptying ash trays and garbage, cleaning up the bathrooms, and at times, cleaning up a customer's dinner.

Or what about inventory? Did you ever think about the job of restocking coolers, or making sure there are enough snacks, then counting dirty rags and counting kegs? Yes, a bartender has to do more than just open the bar and start pouring.

"Uh, can you tell me how to get out of this place bud," (belch).

"Straight down the aisle sir."

"Thanks." (hiccup).

"You have ten minutes to drink up, this is last call on all beer."

"Oh, did you hear that? He's trying to get rid of us. Well, we're not leaving till we're done!"

TEN MINUTES later. . . "Sorry folks it's midnight, I have to pick up the beer, state law says so."

"But we aren't done."

"I'm sorry, but the law is the law."

"Oh."

Bartenders don't want trouble, publicity spread almost faster than many comprehend.

First it was learned that the bomb stumbled into the Senate for debate buried in an Energy Research and Development Administration (ERDA) budget request. Many congressmen didn't even know what the bomb was when they approved the budget.

Then we're told the bomb is being tested in Nevada.

Now the President wants money for its development, while the ramifications of the weapon remain unclear. Carter, however, continues to press for global nuclear disarmament.

And then there's the SALT talks and the Russians. U.S. negotiators will have their work cut out for them when they again sit down to discuss arms limitations with a cruise missile and a new bomb behind their backs, especially when the Soviets know all too well that it will be 20 years before they will have a defense against the neutron bomb.

The President is confident that, because it is a tactical weapon, the bomb will not affect SALT talks. What matters much more than his assurances is how the Soviets react to it, because they're on the other side of the table.

It's likely the United States will wind up with nuclear egg on its face when it sends diplomats trotting all over the world warning against arms buildup in other countries when, at home, we spend millions to come up with different variations on the armament theme.

The Senate, in endorsing Carter's proposal last night, debated the bomb for a while on what sketchy information the Pentagon provided. Despite pleas by opponents such as Mark Hatfield, R-Ore., funds were approved mostly with information from the military. The State Department, those involved in arms negotiations, have unfortunately been left out of the picture.

and if there is a time for it it is closing time.

"Did I hear a glass clanking to your purse ma'am?"

"Are you talking to me?"

"Yes."

"I don't think so, but let me check. Oh my, there is one, I don't know how it got in there."

"Sorry, but I'm going to have to take it back."

As soon as the people are gone and the door is locked the clean-up begins; empty all the trash, wash all the glass, scrub the tables, and clean up the johns.

These tasks are undertaken while most people are on their way home. By the time the bartender and his helpers are finished most people are in bed. All this is done to prepare for the next day's customers.

"Hi, remember me? I had two pitchers, three Pepsi's and five beef jerky last night, well, I need the same again tonight and hurry because I want to make this dance."

"Sure, anything you want, and have a good time."

Adoption procedures include study of homes, interviews

Editors note: This is the second of a three-part story dealing with child adoption and foster care facilities.

By LISA CARMICHAEL
Staff Writer
and DEBBIE BURKLUND
Collegian Reporter

Every year, for various reasons, people apply to adopt a child.

Some want to adopt to do their part to ease population explosion. Others adopt because they cannot have children of their own, or because they want a child of a different sex.

Whatever the reason, there are things that must be done before a person or couple can adopt a child.

"If a family is interested in adopting through our agency, the first thing to do is to make an application," Melanie Hawkinson, adoptive worker for Manhattan Social Rehabilitation Services (SRS), said. "Once their application is received, we begin the home study. The time needed to complete the home study from the time of application is three to six months.

"After the home study is finished we have a staffing in our agency where several people are involved, and they approve the family as an adoptive family," Hawkinson said. The prospective parents are then notified as to whether they have been approved or rejected, and this information is then sent to the state department in Topeka.

FOR EVERY child up for adoption in Kansas, the state office picks five families which they feel would provide a good home for the child. The names of those families are sent to the agency that has the child.

This agency interviews the prospective parents and decides which would be the best home for the child.

After a child is placed in the home, there is a supervisory period during which the parents and the social worker may work out problems of adjustment or other areas where help is needed. The supervisory period for children under one year of age is six months. For older children it is at least 10 months.

There is a waiting period after information on the family is sent to Topeka. The time varies depending on various conditions, such as the number of applicants, staff limitations and the number and needs of available children.

After three years, the family is taken out of the pool unless there is a special reason they should be kept in, Hawkinson said.

PEOPLE desiring to adopt are usually requested to have a medical examination proving they are sterile, Hawkinson said. In the case of a married couple, the marital relationship is studied. The couple must have been married for at least two years to be eligible.

They must be 21 years old and there shouldn't be more than 35 years difference between the oldest petitioner and the child they want to adopt, said Pauline Neel, social service supervisor. Older parents are encouraged to take older or handicapped children, she said.

Janice Waide, adoption and foster care specialist in Topeka, said there are other considerations concerning the prospective parents. They should not make an application within a year after losing a child or having a miscarriage. The couple should also wait at least six months after one of them has had major surgery.

THE ONLY COSTS entailed in adopting a child are those charged by the attorney and the probate court costs at the completion of the adoption.

Local attorneys said they charge about $200 for stepparent adoptions and up to $300 for an adoption through an agency. Court costs run $15 to $20 and if publication is necessary, it costs another $15 to $20.

There is no charge for services in preparing the adoptive study through SRS. The parent's income level is taken into consideration, but parents are not discriminated against on the basis of their income, Neel said.

"There is an adoption support program where adoptive parents, if they aren't financially eligible, can receive a certain amount of money to help support their child," Hawkinson said.

PARENTS may go through a non-agency adoption, where the child is placed in the home through an attorney, doctor or other adoption agency.

"It would still come through us (SRS) because it goes through the probate court and it comes to us because we're from the state," Neel said. SRS is not involved with stepparent adoptions. Neel said this is up to the court unless they ask the agency for an investigation.

Former pro football players now work in Aggieville bars

By DIXIE HOLMES
Collegian Reporter

According to beer commercials, football players and beer are a good combination.

Mike Kuhn and Dennis Morrison must agree.

Kuhn, former manager and now co-owner of Mr. K's, and Morrison, manager of Aggie Station, both played professional football.

Kuhn played defensive end for K-State and received all Big Eight and second team All-American honors in 1970, his senior year. He went on to play professional football for four years.

As an outside linebacker, he played first for Dallas in the American Football League (AFL), then for Winnipeg in the Canadian League and finally for Detroit in the World Football League (WFL).

During his final year in the pros, Kuhn dislocated his shoulder. That same year the WFL went bankrupt.

Kuhn and other players are still

Both men feel fortunate to have played professional football although they said it isn't as glamorous as many people think. "The typical fan sees Monday night, not all the sweat and pain that goes into football before the actual game," Kuhn said.

After spending from 7:30 every morning until 10 every night thinking and playing football, it "makes you wonder if you really want to be there," Kuhn said.

PROFESSIONAL football isn't "as glamorous as it's made out to be," Morrison said. "It's more emotionally demanding than college ball, especially for a quarterback," he said.

Kuhn said he believed there wasn't much physical difference between pro and college ball but there were more emotional and mental transitions.

"In pro football there is always uncertainty. You never know if you will be cut from game to game," he said. "In college ball you may not get to play but you'll always be around for the victory parties and such."

After playing professional football and then coming back to Manhattan, his home town, Kuhn said it wasn't really a let down, but it was different no longer being in the limelight.

"You're a peer again instead of a hero," Kuhn said. "I realized that physically I couldn't play football all my life so I had to determine my priorities. I'm lucky I got to play when I did and lucky I came out in one piece," he said.

AFTER an unsuccessful tryout for Canada, Morrison said he too had to weigh decisions.

"I decided it wasn't worth it," he said. "I was disappointed I couldn't play longer, but I was fortunate to play when I did. There were a lot of downs but there were ups, too. I learned a lot."

Both men said they are pleased with living in Manhattan and the bar business.

"The bar business is competitive and requires working with people like athletes," Morrison said.

According to Kuhn, professional football is "a business like anything else" and helped prepare him for a career outside of football.

Morrison and Kuhn get the chance to stay competitive yearly in the alumni-varsity football game. For the last three years, Kuhn has been named the most valuable player in those games.

MIKE KUHN... Co-owner of Mr. K's suing for the money owed them by the WFL.

MORRISON graduated from K-State in 1972 and was drafted by the San Francisco 49'ers. As a quarterback, he played for them in 1973 and part of the 1974 season.

After earning the starting quarterback position, his ribs were broken in the 10th game against the Los Angeles Rams and he was released.

'Love Story' plot entertaining, but suffers from poor dialogue

"Love Story" is showing at 8:00 p.m. today in the Little Theater. Admission price is $1.

By JIM CHALFANT
Collegian Reviewer

"Love Story" is just what the title proclaims—a love story.

Unfortunately, that's about all it is. The film is full of old stereotypes and poor dialogue. The plot is the only thing that makes it entertaining.

It's the tragic story of Oliver (Ryan O'Neal) and Jenny (Ali

Collegian Review

MacGraw), who meet and fall in love at college, although it seems like they never have to go to class.

When they decide to get married, Oliver's father tries to stop him, threatening to cut him from the family millions. They get married anyway, and struggle to put Oliver through Harvard Law School on their meager incomes. Sound familiar?

In order to make this film a little different from the last 50 with that very same plot, Love Story has a new twist. It begins after Jenny's death, with Oliver telling us the story of their marriage.

Through the movie, the viewer knows there will be no happy ending.

The fact the viewer knows Jenny is going to die makes "Love Story" even sadder to watch as O'Neal tries to hide it from her. When she does find out, their struggle to come to grips with her death is an engaging story in itself.

Even though the acting isn't that good, and the plot is only a variation on an old theme, "Love Story" is at least going to keep you interested. It's not the best romance ever done, nor is it the saddest, but it's almost guaranteed to bring tears to your eyes.

If you like to leave the theater sad, you won't be disappointed. The ending is enough to ruin a good mood.

Ice cream easy to make at home

By DIANE GONZOLAS
Collegian Reporter

Homemade ice cream may be just a few cranks away.

If you are an ice cream lover but don't love all those impossible to pronounce ingredients in the commercial kind, making your own may be the answer.

"You can be a little more creative when you make your own," said Kayann Heinly, Riley County Extension home economist.

"The most important things are to follow a good recipe and be creative," said Heinly, who grew up in a family that made its own ice cream.

There are different methods of making ice cream but Heinly said most people use an ice cream freezer.

ICE CREAM freezers have a metal or plastic canister with a paddle or dasher inside. The container turns around the dasher as the freezer is cranked either by hand or by an electric motor. The container sits in a bucket of ice and rock salt which freezes the ingredients.

"In doing it by hand the most important thing is the relationship of salt to ice," Heinly said. "If you don't have enough (salt) it's not going to freeze." Heinly recommended one cup of salt to six cups of ice.

"After it's frozen you remove the paddle and let it ripen for two hours before you eat it," Heinly said.

RIPENING or freezing can be done in the ice cream freezer itself. Just repack the freezer with fresh ice and salt and cover it with something heavy. An alternative is to spoon the ice cream into plastic containers, cover with foil or plastic wrap, put on the lid and put it into your refrigerator's freezer.

If you don't have an ice cream freezer, you can still make your own ice cream. Put the mixture into an ice cube tray and cover with foil or use a covered plastic container. The mixture will have to be taken out of the freezer and beaten a few times while it is freezing.

"You have to incorporate some air into it or else you end up with a hard lump," Heinly said.

SOME RECIPES for ice cream mixtures call for cooking and others don't. Heinly said she recommends a cooked base to insure the eggs are safe.

"The USDA says if you have clean, sound, uncracked eggs then you can have an uncooked base," Heinly said.

"The secret is in the beating of ingredients together," Heinly said. She beats the eggs until frothy and then adds the sugar slowly. She continues beating while she adds part of the cream and then the flavorings. The rest of the cream is added last.

"Freezing always takes away the flavor or changes it so you have to add quite a bit," Heinly said. She said lumpy ingredients should be added before churning. "Fruit is better added in a puree or in very small chunks."

THE JULY Apartment Life suggests using vanilla beans instead of extract when making vanilla ice cream. A few hours before you plan to make the ice cream, measure out the amount of sugar you are going to use in a bowl. Cut a vanilla bean in half and scrape out the insides into the sugar. Throw the rest of the bean in and let the sugar stand for several hours.

Before freezing remove the bulk of the bean but leave the scrapings in. Or, if you're cooking the mixture, heat a bean with the cream and then scrape the seeds into the mix.

"If people have problems with lumpy ice cream they should try a cooked base," Heinly said. After cooking, the base must be chilled thoroughly. "This is essential for a smooth base," she said.

"A lot of people fill their freezers too full," Heinly said. "You'll get much more fluffy ice cream if you leave room for it to expand." She said she usually fills her freezer only two-thirds full.

Heinly said the cost of homemade ice cream is generally more than commercial.

"It can be very expensive or fairly inexpensive depending on the ingredients," she said. "What you add to it quite often adds to the cost."

Coeds compete for Miss Kansas title

Four K-State coeds will compete in the Miss America pageant preliminaries for Miss Kansas at Pratt this weekend.

Lori Bergen, Miss Manhattan-K-State and a freshman in history representing Alpha Xi Delta and Goodnow Hall, will present a violin solo for her talent competition.

The other three contestants are Lisa Henry, junior in elementary education; Lisa Montgomery, sophomore in music, and Cathy McCandles, freshman in general.

The winner of the state competition will represent Kansas in the Miss America Scholarship Pageant at Atlantic City, N.J., in September.

Danger of cancer faces sunbathers about skin cancer, I wouldn't be out here.

"The first warm day of spring, I'm out trying to tan my lily-white legs. People just don't look good pale," she said.

A MALE student summed up the philosophy of the sunbathers.

"To hell with skin cancer. We'll all get it anyway if we keep destroying the ozone layer with aerosol sprays," he said.

Accompanying every sunbather to the beach is his favorite brand of suntan lotion. There are a variety of products on the market, containing such things as palm oil, coconut oil and cocoa butter.

Exceptions to this are products containing PABA (para-amino-benzoic acid), highly recommended by dermatologists. PABA builds up as a reservoir in the skin with regular use and isn't washed off with swimming or perspiration. It allows only a gradual tan, even with exposure to midday sun.

The "tanning rays" and "burning rays" of suntan lotion advertising are one and the same: The sun's invisible ultraviolet light. Skin has two natural defenses against ultraviolet radiation, as explained by James Conniff in The New York Times Magazine.

THE FIRST is the thickening of epidermal cells, allowing less of the rays to reach inner layers of skin cells. The other is the process which results in tanned skin, Conniff said. The skin produces melanin, a dark pigment, which moves to the surface of the skin. There, it absorbs ultraviolet rays and produces a tan.

If the skin is exposed to too much ultraviolet light before these natural defenses have a chance to build up, damage results. Injured capillary cells swell, creating a painful red sunburn. This effect shows up within hours after exposure.

The other effects may remain hidden for years. Connective tissues toughen. The skin elastin, responsible for the resilience and pliability of skin, also deteriorates. This damage waits, sometimes until middle age, until showing up as wrinkled, leathery, spotted skin, dilated blood vessels and sagging flesh.

Another effect is more serious. Skin cancer is occurring at the rate of 300,000 new cases a year in the United States. It is responsible for 5,000 deaths annually. Norman Orentreich, a New York dermatologist, reports a five-fold increase in skin cancer in the past 25 years.

Fortunately, the cure rate of skin cancer is high compared to other types of cancer. The malignancies are easily accessible for surgery, usually located on arms, neck, nose, chin or ears. Surgery can leave the victim badly scarred, however. By taking the proper precautions, moderate tanning can be done with little danger. If the rules aren't followed the sun can burn, scar and age skin.

Unwise tanning is like playing with fire.

Mike Finamore was told he had leukemia. Nine years ago.

When Mike Finamore was thirteen years old, he was told he had leukemia.

At that time, this meant he had five, maybe six months, to live.

But just about then, leukemia research produced some dramatic results:

A special combination of drugs that would kill the leukemia cells in the blood and permit the person to live longer than ever before.

So Mike was treated. And it worked.

He didn't die.

Instead, he became one of the fortunate few to have leukemia and live. And today his weekly treatments enable him to lead a normal life.

In fact, right now he's putting the roof on a house he built himself.

And when it's finished there will be a double celebration.

The new house. And Mike's 22nd birthday.

Most people expect presents. Mike's happy just to have a birthday.

Helicopter incident 'a mistake'

WASHINGTON (AP)—President Carter said Thursday that the U.S. helicopter shot down in North Korea had flown over Communist territory by mistake and that "our primary interest is in having the incident not escalate into a confrontation."

Three American crewmen were killed and a fourth was captured Thursday in the latest incident marring the uneasy Korean truce. The North Koreans later failed to show up for a meeting sought by the American-led United Nations command and the discussion is set for Saturday (10 p.m. EDT Friday).

Press Secretary Jody Powell told reporters Thursday afternoon that North Korean members of the armistice commission said the captured man had been wounded and was receiving medical treatment.

POWELL SAID he did not know whether U.S. troops in South Korea were placed on alert. But a pentagon spokesman said there was no change in alert status.

Asked whether the administration viewed the incident as a crisis, Powell responded:

"Certainly not in the sense of an impending war or large scale military involvement. Objectively, any situations in which American lives are lost or in jeopardy are viewed with very deep concern."

The helicopter, Powell said, was enroute to pick up a South Korean navigator and that "even though the pilot was qualified to fly in the buffer zone south of the DMZ (demilitarized zone), he had never flown there and he was not familiar with the terrain."

He added that the helicopter was fired upon soon after crossing the demarcation line but "this is one of the areas of ambiguity."

THE WHITE House clearly sought to project an aura of calm.

"We are trying to let them know that we realize the mistake was made by the crew in going into the demilitarized zone," Carter told seven senators at an early morning White House meeting. "Our primary interest is in having the incident not escalate into a confrontation but also to account for the crew members."

Testifying on Capitol Hill, George Brown, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the shooting has not changed the military leadership's support for Carter's plan to withdraw U.S. combat troops from South Korea.

"The North Koreans acted in a manner entirely consistent with their past behavior," Brown told the House Armed Services Committee.

The Pentagon was notifying relatives that their next-of-kin were aboard the aircraft but a spokesman said it was not known which of the four was captured. Their names were withheld.

Pentagon spokesman Thomas Ross said no special measures were being taken by U.S. troops in Korea.

"There is no change in the alert status of American forces in Korea," Ross said. "The forces remain on normal status."

Con Edison takes heat for black out

NEW YORK (AP)—The lights came on in most of New York Thursday night, while leaders of the nation's largest city tried to prevent further outbreaks of looting, violence and apparent arson inspired by a total electrical power blackout.

Twenty-four hours after the lights went out, about 90 per cent of the city had electricity again.

Police reported isolated looting Thursday night, but said that the trouble was less serious than the night before when the whole city was in darkness.

AT ITS WORST Wednesday night and Thursday morning, the power failure left 10 million people without electricity and brought looting and what the mayor called "a night of terror" for some.

Outraged city officials demanded an explanation of why, despite safety devices, lightning bolts shut down the massive system. President Carter ordered a Federal Power Commission investigation, and the mayor said Con Edison was guilty of gross negligence. Utility officials denied the mayor's charge.

Most New Yorkers took the blackout in stride, despite the hot humid night. But, unlike the Northeast blackout of 1965, it had incidents of widespread heavy looting and violence.

POLICE SAID they arrested nearly 3,000 people, at least six times normal.

"The people have been the victims of violence, vandalism and looting," Beame told a news conference in which he strongly criticized Con Edison for the blackout which lingered hours longer than the 1965 outage.

"We cannot tolerate in this age of modern technology a power system that can shut down the nation's largest city," Beame said.

City Council President Paul O'Dwyer said, meanwhile, he knew of no evidence that lightning caused the blackout. He said that Con Ed employees with whom he spoke saw no lightning bolt near electrical plant that was knocked out.

Dreams of stardom shattered; oh, the pain of being gonged

By DENNIS BOONE
Collegian Reporter

Throughout recorded history, chapter after chapter has been written on man's inhumanity to man. But more than medieval torture chambers, world wars or neutron bombs, there exists today one classic example of that inhumanity.

The Gong Show.

After more than a year on the air, the show has become the rage of college campuses, where students nationwide flock to student union televisions to catch a glimpse of some of the most outrageous acts ever brought into America's living rooms.

And, to a lesser extent, those college kids have beaten a path to southern California, where the show is produced and taped.

All of which leads to Ross Stryker and John Donmyer.

Today the two are relatively unknowns from K-State. But as of July 28, the duo will have notoriety—for at least 45 seconds, when their recent performance on the Gong Show will be televised.

STRYKER, who will return to K-State this fall as a senior in pre-dentistry, said he ventured into Tinseltown with Donmyer, a graduate in statistics now working in Chicago, when they left for a brief vacation.

The idea behind the getaway, Stryker said, was to enjoy the summer sun and not, he contends, embarrass themselves in front of millions.

And, according to his way of thinking, they succeeded, despite being gonged after the minimum time of 45 seconds.

"We took off for California and had made plans to go to Disneyland, maybe take in a Dodgers' game, and then somebody said 'Why not try to go on the Gong Show?'" Stryker said.

So, the pair headed west and managed to get an audition for the show.

"The way they work it is to give you a first audition, then the producers decide what acts would be good to have on the show," Stryker said. "From there you get a second audition, and if they want you on, they'll assign you a day to be taped."

THE SHOW, which features between four to seven acts daily, is judged by a panel of three comedians. When an act has sufficiently proven itself to be of little entertainment value, one of the three will swing a foam-covered stick against the side of a huge gong.

When the gong sounds, the act is over. If the act is good enough, that is, of some entertainingly redeeming value, it is allowed to run its course, and the winner receives cash and prizes, usually worth $500 and loose change.

And, under the title of "Manhattan, Kansas," Stryker and Donmyer advanced onto the stage and captured runner-up honors for the worst act of the week.

"I think they call it 'Most Outrageous Act' now," Stryker said. "But I'm not sure we got our allotted 45 seconds. We timed our act later and they must have been waiting with gong in hand to get rid of us."

WHAT TYPE of act could have warranted a minimum-time gonging?

"Well, John came out on stage in a tux and tails," Stryker said. "Originally we had planned on him playing at a piano, but, as it turned out, he was just seated at a piano bench, with no piano."

And then?

"Well," said Stryker, "I came out next, wearing a shark suit."

A shark suit?

"Right."

Doing what?

"I sang 'Born Free.'"

Just what prompted Stryker to render the audience unconscious with laughter at the sight of a shark singing 'Born Free' remains a mystery.

"We knew if we didn't have an outrageous act, something really zany, we'd never get on," Stryker said.

State upgrades foster care program

Editors note: This is the last of a three-part story dealing with child adoption and foster care facilities.

By LISA CARMICHAEL
Staff Writer

Many children live in foster homes. These homes serve as substitutes until the natural parents can take care of their children properly.

Foster parents provide 24 hour live-in care for children. In Kansas, anyone who is interested in being a foster parent can contact their local Social Rehabilitation Services (SRS). The State Board of Health will check to make sure there is enough room in the home for extra children. There are few other requirements.

Kansas is working to improve the foster care services. There is now a Foster Parents' Certification Board which encourages foster parents to gain professional standard.

"To be a certified foster parent, they have to meet certain qualifications," said Lorita Whitaker, chairman of the certification board.

"They must have had at least two years of experience as foster parents and taken 300 hours of appropriate training. They must also have recommendations," she said.

THE TRAINING can be obtained through workshops and classes offered by community colleges or universities. They must be approved by the board and the parents must take hours of instruction in different areas such as 40 hours in health and safety and 80 hours in child development.

If a person wants to specialize in a certain area such as adolescence or early childhood, it takes an additional 100 hours of training in that area.

For the past three years, K-State's Department of Family and Child Development (FCD) has been working to prepare a course of study for foster parents who want to be certified.

Some of the topics covered in the course are Introduction to Parenting, Social and Psychological Development of Children, and Moral Development in the Adolescent Years. The research was made possible by a grant from the Office of Child Development, a department of HEW.

TO KEEP their certification, the parents must take 10 hours every year, much as teachers must renew their teaching certificate, Whitaker said.

Another phase of foster parenting is the way in which children are placed in homes and when they can be returned to their natural parents.

"Kansas has a good reporting system and keeps good records," said Pam Marr, FCD research assistant, "but they have problems with heavy caseloads. They are presently looking into the Oregon Project."

IN OREGON, the social workers have been working closely with the natural parents to get the children back into their homes. Parents know they need to do something, but often they were not told what they should improve.

Under the Oregon Project, the parents are given an outline and a time limit on things they need to improve. Most of the parents cooperated when they knew what needed to be corrected and how to correct their errors, Marr said.

If these items are not corrected, action is taken to sever parental ties or put the children in permanent foster homes.

IN PERMANENT foster care homes, a contract is made with the natural parents, the foster parents and the agency. If it is possible, the children are consulted while drawing up the contract.

This contract gives most of the rights of the natural parents to the foster parents, although the natural parents still have some rights such as visitation rights.

"It is important for the foster children to see their natural parents as real people, and to be in contact with their natural parents if at all possible," Marr said. "By maintaining contact or knowing about their real parents, they gain a sense of identity."

Foster parents are needed in every part of the state, said Janice Waide, adoption and foster care specialist in Topeka. There are 2,300 licensed homes in Kansas.

"We try to keep children as close to their natural parents as possible," she said.

PEOPLE who can cope with children with special needs are in demand, Waide said. Often these children have physical or emotional handicaps. There is also a need for more minority foster homes. Presently there are about 200 black foster homes, a dozen with Spanish surnames, and less than six homes that are of American Indian descent.

Single people are encouraged to be foster parents. There are widowers, divorcees and other single people who are certified foster parents or earning the certification, Whitaker said.

"There is a constant need for more foster homes," Waide said. "There is never a shortage of children in need of foster care. Most of these children will never be available for adoption, but we try to return them to their natural home as soon as possible."

Farrell collects $7,000 annually

Delinquent fines cost library

By DEAN SPEIRS
Collegian Reporter

Farrell Library collects $7,000 in fines annually and another $7,000 for lost books, Jay Rausch, dean of libraries for K-State, said.

"We send bills upwards of one or two hundred dollars," said Rachel Moreland, circulation librarian. "In the last eleven months we have sent 476 delinquent reports to offices of deans for unreturned items, and we have sent 459 reports for unpaid fines."

Delinquent reports put a hold on students' records that stops enrollment, graduation, or receipt of transcripts until fines are paid.

STUDENTS are also charged a processing fee when a delinquent report is filed. The charge is $2, which is very minimal, Moreland said.

"When the cost of all the paperwork to various departments is totaled," she said, "$2 doesn't begin to cover it."

Moreland said the fine system evolved from tradition more than anything else. She also said there have been no changes in the amounts charged for several years.

"Five or six years ago the charge for late overnight materials went up," she said, "but since then everything has stayed the same."

FINES are set by the circulation department and approved by the library administration, Moreland said. Farrell Library charges both accumulated fines and book cost for lost books.

"The cost of a book is just a drop in the bucket compared to our cost," Rausch said. "We have to account for staff time, ordering, processing, cataloguing, postage and paperwork.

"Some would like to buy books from us, for example, if a book they want is out of print.

"Our purpose is not to make money through fines, but to get books back for other people who need to use them," Rausch said.

RAUSCH said K-State has a small collection of library materials for the size of its student body.

"We really haven't found an alternative to fines, but I wish we could," he said. "It would spare us having to deal with people who are unpleasant because they've accumulated large fines and it would save us staff time."

Rausch said he finds the fine system unattractive from the library's standpoint.

"The fine process costs us more than we make," he said. "We have to cross-check every late book to be sure there are no goof-ups on our part before we charge fines. The workload is tremendous."

"We have two people working full-time on fines, and we also have a good deal of student help. It probably costs us $15,000 to $16,000 to do the work involved."

Rausch considered eliminating fines. He thought books might be checked out for a semester, with the student having responsibility to return materials when finished with them. Those who didn't return materials at the end of the semester would not have to pay a fine, but if the material was not returned or paid for, a hold would be placed on his records.

"The problem with this is that we'd end up with a backlog at the end of each semester," Rausch said. "We wouldn't have enough staff to handle the deluge of materials."

"Each year half of our material circulates," he said. "If we changed to a due date at the end of the semester, we might have 200,000 volumes dumped on us all at once."

There is a way to solve the problem of unavailable material, however.

"Requested material could be subject to recall," Rausch said, "and we could have a stiff fine for requested material."

MIAMI—Eastern Airlines proposed on Thursday a special $299 fee fare that would allow two people traveling together to fly on a nearly unlimited basis among 105 cities in the United States, Canada, Mexico and the Caribbean during a 21-day period.

"We're almost right down to bus rates," Eastern spokesman James Ashlock said. "I can't think of anything that benefits the consumer more."

"And we need to fill empty seats. This is just like a store. We need people, and we're trying to come up with incentives to convince people to go."

The offer by Eastern is the first time a major airline has attempted to provide unlimited travel at a basic fee. Smaller airlines have offered similar plans but only on a regional basis, an Eastern spokesman said.

The plan would be similar to a Eurorail pass on European railroads. Amtrak and major American bus companies also offer such a package.

WASHINGTON—The wife of a Russian defector-turned-American double agent appealed to President Carter Thursday to end a real life spy story by interceding with the Russians, who she believes kidnapped her husband 18 months ago.

State Department sources confirmed reports that Nicholas Shadrin was acting as a double agent for the FBI when he disappeared in Vienna, Austria, on Dec. 20, 1975, after going to meet two agents of the Soviet secret police.

The State Department's official spokesman, Hodding Carter, refused to confirm the reports or discuss the department's efforts to find Shadrin. But he acknowledged the department was trying to locate him.

WICHITA—America's wheat farmers should expect an acreage reduction program this fall in which they will not be compensated for the land they set aside, a top Agricultural Department official indicated Thursday.

Robert Meyer, an assistant secretary of agriculture, told the Kansas Cattle Feeders Conference that a setaside is the "principal" option available to counter a huge surplus of wheat.

Meyer also said he understood that it was Agriculture Secretary Bob Bergland's feeling that President Carter would veto a price support level of $2.90 a bushel for 1977 wheat.

WASHINGTON—The Justice Department is trying to collect nearly $57 million in fines from thousands of convicted criminals, including Watergate conspirator Gordon Liddy and moonshiners from the prohibition era.

Department officials say many poor defendants will go to their graves without ever raising the money to settle their debts to the government.

"Unfortunately, our debtors are notoriously poor," remarked Ronald Roos, chief of the collections unit in the department's criminal division.

Roos and collections officer Franklin Shippen said in interviews Thursday that many fines won't be collected because the individuals don't have the money.

They said some rich convicts also avoid payment by concealing vast wealth behind a web of complicated financial maneuvers.

KANSAS CITY—Frank White, on the hottest hitting streak of his career, singled and tripled, driving in three runs last night to lead the Kansas City Royals past the Detroit Tigers 4-3.

White's RBI triple in the sixth inning marked the fifth consecutive game in which he has driven in a run.

Jim Colborn, 11-9, surrendered eight hits and both runs before he was relieved by Larry Gura, who notched his seventh game.

Woman police officer says social work vital to her job

By SHEREE LOWE

Collegian Reporter

Sex discrimination in the job market may be a fact of life in some professions, but for Glenda Tullio it has never been a problem.

Glenda Tullio, an officer on the Riley County Police force, admits she has never felt discriminated against because of her sex by her bosses or colleagues during her career.

Serving in the military for four years was what initially interested her in police work, according to Tullio.

"I have always had a strong belief in right and wrong and like to be involved in working with and helping people," Tullio said.

TULLIO, who has been in police work for eight years, had served on police forces in Los Angeles, Calif., and Albuquerque, N.M., before coming to Manhattan.

"I work five days a week, eight hours a day and do everything that males do. This includes covering accidents, writing tickets, doing daily reports and working referral cases," Tullio said.

"Everyday something happens. It may not be a milestone, but with each incident encountered experience and knowledge are gained. With this continual new knowledge our horizons are broadened daily and we can go into the next case and use this experience," Tullio said.

"You must deal with people as though you know what you're doing so they'll take what you say at face value with respect. An officer's job in many cases is to instill faith in the people who called," Tullio said.

Tullio views her job as similar to that of a movie director.

"When you answer a call, you must take over the show and try to earn the cooperation and respect you need to get the job done effectively," Tullio said.

Making people know you care for them as people, not just because they're a statistic or in your line of duty is the key to good police work, according to Tullio.

GLENDIA TULLIO... Riley County Police officer.

FOLLOW-UP work by officers is not done in many cases, except for domestics. These problems concern married couples or parents and children and are often re-checked.

"One way follow-up can be avoided is to complete your job efficiently when you first encounter it. Before I leave a case I try and instill self-confidence in the people, reminding them I care about their welfare and that they can call me anytime day or night if they need me. In most cases people then feel confident enough to work their own problems out and don't usually call back," Tullio said.

Social work and counseling are a vital and important part of police work.

"I feel this is more true with women officers than men. In many cases people look to me for maturity because I bear their same roles as a wife and mother. Because of this, I would never tell anyone to do anything or refer them to anything that I wouldn't do myself," Tullio said.

REFERRALS are frequent in the cases of children, especially those that are borderline ages (around 16 years). These cases are usually discovered by walk-in informants or a missing persons report.

"In most cases the parents and children need to unburden to trained ears and listen to the suggestions they offer," Tullio said.

Tullio's education consists of 280 hours of book learning from a police academy and several classes on administrative justice and criminology.

"This education behind me is a help, but in this business you learn by doing. The key is to have common sense and a little bit of knowledge and know when and how to put them together," Tullio said.

Scorn the porn

Manhattan's theater management is under the impression that an advertisement in the student newspaper is unnecessary because most students are aware of what is playing in town, and because the movies advertise themselves.

There is, however, one objectionable exception. In the few instances when an X-rated movie comes to town, the theater management will invariably look to the Collegian to push the porn.

Recently, an extremely popular movie, "Star Wars" has been playing in Manhattan. The film was not advertised in the Collegian.

The advertising for an X-rated movie in today's issue is only the third off-campus theater advertisement we have carried this summer. Of the other two, shortly after summer school started, one was for a porno flick.

This has been true in the past as well; it seems when a theater's management prostitutes itself by bringing in a piece of trash, it feels the need to peddle the movie a little bit harder.

WE CAN only draw two conclusions from this. Either the films are so repulsive that only an advertisement in this paper will bring students to the theater, or the theater management believes this crap is the only material worth advertising to the University audience.

We believe in free speech and a free press. We are not objecting to the film ads, and, in fact, we accept any ad which isn't blatantly offensive.

Nor are we suggesting X-rated films have no place in our community. Indeed, many artistic endeavors have been X-rated and successful at the same time. We are not recommending censorship.

But we strongly object to the practice of theater management only advertising this sort of valueless material in the Collegian, insinuating K-State students are only interested in porno films.

It is insulting to think that theater management has such a low opinion of those in the K-State community.

We are aware, as is everyone else in this community, that Manhattan theaters would not be where they are today if it were not for this University. If students would scorn the porn, the message would soon be read loud and clear.

Although Jack the Ripper and the Boston Strangler are no longer around, some may wish they were in light of their counterparts of the 70s.

It may be a cliché question to pose, but, "What is this world coming to?"

It's not sufficient anymore to "just" murder someone. It has to be more. It has to be characteristically brutal, savage and sometimes sadistic. Mauling murders are becoming so common it may be fair to recognize them as a trend or pastime. And that is a gut-wrenching thought.

The "trend" hit me full force in 1974 when a K-State coed who was from my hometown was kidnapped, murdered and raped, in that order. She had been stabbed numerous times.

IT HAPPENS here in Midway, U.S.A., too. No longer can we gasp as we did when Sharon Tate, Abigail Folger and others died at the hands of the Manson murderers, and dismiss it with a non-committal shrug. Now it's happening in our backyards.

Probably the worst of the violence, however, is not here. Nevertheless, we shouldn't and cannot shrug it away. Son of Sam, the .44 caliber killer, is in New York, the very realization of his existence a terror as he stalks the metropolis killing without reason.

By last week, he had killed five people and wounded six and is now being hunted by 100 police officers.

Yes, Son of Sam exists as a person, but he is also an intangible ideal of terror without gender, color or individual identity. And this terror pervades every nook and cranny of the world, breeding violence, disruption and death.

WHAT WE need to worry about is when we no longer feel shock or amazement when we hear about a Son of Sam running rampant somewhere, when such incidents become so common we accept the news like a weather report.

"It's fair today — only one crucifixion in the first few seconds of the day. Terrorist possibilities at 97 per cent, fairly average for this time of the year."

Commercials will advertise bullet-proof body suits and cars and people will walk the streets with helmets on to avoid recognition and hard objects. We will have to build playgrounds within our houses, because the streets will no longer be safe enough for our children to play outside.

It will be a sad day when we have to stop and think about our plans and activities because we feel something sadistic or fatalistic may happen to us. I don't want to be around when it comes.

Or is it already here?

Pervasive power of television

A plethora of books and magazine articles have been devoting themselves to the improvement of self. The discovery of our individual identities has become the quest of the 70s. From Werner Erhard's "est" to Transcendental Meditation, persons search for a way to improve their personalities and the means they use to cope with everyday life.

Why this sudden need to read about improving one's life? How have we lost our individualness so that we must rely on someone else to give it back to us?

There is probably no catch-all explanation. Many factors have undoubtedly entered into the creation of this need.

The troubled consciousness of the 60s has perhaps produced a feeling of loss for the persons involved with the issues of those times. The 70s, being relatively quiet internally, have produced a desire for individuals to recall themselves.

DESPITE some of the sociological reasons, what other factor can we find which has resulted in the loss of identity so many are now trying to rediscover?

Although perhaps too trite an answer, indications are that the great, bold, enveloping medium of television has not only created a loss of identity but also a loss of creativity.

The little box which sits in the corner of our living rooms and bedrooms spewing information and "entertainment" at us has more impact on our lives than we may wish to admit.

The aura of television has not faded from the 1950s when it first became popular.

When the first televisions came onto the consumer market, few people could afford them. Groups would gather around the one set in the neighborhood, entranced with the new communications system. And television had great potential.

The full potential of the medium has not been realized. In our commercial society, television has become a method of communicating advertising and has not become the vast educational resource it could still be.

THE MEDIUM demands our involvement. We cannot sit idly watching a television show, only glancing at the screen. We must become involved emotionally with the characters portrayed and their collective problems.

This is what makes the medium so dangerous in its current form. While we may vehemently deny the power television has over us, we continue to be immersed in its offerings.

Not only does the present form of television have its dangers, but newer, larger, more advanced televisions are being introduced. First reports indicate a higher level of emotional involvement on the part of the individual watching the new television sets.

What are the new machines like? They are the seven foot monsters we view now in bars and restaurants. Only they will not long be confined to public arenas. The manufacture and distribution of the monster machines among home audiences has already begun.

Our narcissism will be doubled. The violence will be more involving and very real.

By becoming so involved with a medium, we have lost sight of ourselves; we have lost our individual identities.

Capitalizing on this loss has led to the great proliferation of identity literature. By chastising us for losing ourselves, authors are making fortunes.

The only problem comes when we read, try to improve ourselves and then return to the television set to escape our new-found identities. It happens.

We not only lose ourselves, but we lose a vital part of our existence, creativity, we put ourselves for endless hours front of the "boob tube."

The medium of television does not allow for individual creativity and the exercise of our imagination. We are only asked to digest what is being played before us.

So, before our minds are overrun by the monster machines, let's stop and consider where we are allowing ourselves to be led. We must do something television does not encourage. . . think.

Professor studies energy; designs, builds wind tunnel

By MIKE NOEL
Collegian Reporter

Keith Christensen, associate professor of architecture, is concerned about air. He's also concerned about the energy crisis. Christensen and the architecture department built a wind tunnel to see if their concern with air could help ease the energy crisis.

"What we need to do as architects and any designers of physical space—urban planning or architecture of single buildings—is to know a great deal more about just air movement around buildings. We don't know enough about it," Christensen said.

THE WIND TUNNEL, designed and built by Christensen with a grant from the Bureau of General Research at K-State, is used by architecture students to study the air flow around models of buildings.

"We have to know specifically if a building is placed in a certain position or angle what we can expect the air currents can be. And if someone else puts another building beside it, what we can expect is going to happen," Christensen said.

According to Christensen, the air tunnel helps determine these air currents. However, he also uses the tunnel as a means of conducting experiments in wind as an energy-saving device.

"The other part of it (the tunnel) is not only to understand the air flow around buildings, but through buildings," Christensen said.

He called the flow of air through buildings natural ventilation. Opening a window as opposed to turning on an air conditioner is natural ventilation in its simplest form, Christensen said. The wind tunnel helps the students find the correct placement of a building to use natural ventilation to its fullest.

CHRISTENSEN said natural ventilation has been somewhat overlooked in the attempt to conserve energy.

"As we understand the need to conserve energy, one of the first things that has been suggested by quite a number of people is to reduce the window size so we can reduce energy consumption," he said.

"But this goes counter to two other ideas. As we reduce window area, we reduce the potential for natural ventilation. The other factor is if we reduce window size we reduce natural illumination," Christensen said.

Christensen said he blames the energy crisis for the needed return to natural ventilation.

"Largely we've ignored it because we could install a bigger air conditioner or a bigger furnace," Christensen said. "We had all kinds of power and we didn't have to worry about it—but no more."

K-State is not alone in the study of wind and its effect on conserving energy. According to Christensen, many universities throughout the country and the world are studying this field.

"Some of the best information I've gotten has been from the University of Nova Scotia and the University of Sydney in Australia," Christensen said.

Possible gas rationing concerns dealers, boosts small car sales

By SHEREE LOWE
Collegian Reporter

Automobiles are necessary in today's society due to the continual growth in cities.

Car manufacturers, dealers and consumers are conscious of the expense and problems of gasoline.

Gasoline is a frequent item in the news with the possibility of gas rationing and hints that gas prices will reach 75 cents to $1 per gallon in the next year.

"If gas rationing goes into effect the economy will flip-flop and the results would be disastrous," said Kent Peters, a local car dealer in Manhattan.

THE IDEA of taxing owners of large cars and offering rebates to owners of small cars that was proposed by President Carter upset consumers and especially wholesale car dealers, according to Peters.

This proposed policy has not been formally approved, but the mention of it affects the prices of trade-in value of large cars, according to Peters.

"Since January we've taken in over a dozen 1977 cars on trade because of their low gas mileage and we've got very little in return when selling them to used car markets," Peters said.

MOST DEALERS agreed that if gas rationing became effective it would effect the middle class family and the underprivileged.

"If gas rationing or even the increase of gasoline pricing was to happen, owning a large car would be more of a status symbol. It would not be these people, but the general public that would feel the effects," said Jim Gadious, local car salesman.

ALL DEALERS agreed small cars are dominating the market and are selling like "hot cakes."

"Small cars weigh 3,000 to 3,500 pounds in comparison with the larger American cars that weigh 4,500 pounds. Smaller cars also have less horsepower. Despite this, with consumers using more and more gas at continually rising costs the small car is what the consumer wants," said John Malone, parts manager at a local dealership.

Small Claims Court assists students

By STEVE CARTER
Collegian Reporter

Many times students have problems with collecting their security deposits, receiving back items or money they have lent or contracts that have been breached.

Small Claims Court (SCC) is a branch of the District Court, with limited jurisdiction, that can be helpful to an individual with these problems.

Nyles Davis, student attorney at K-State, in a University for Man class on Small Claims Court, outlined the procedures to take to get a case tried in SCC.

In the U.S., actions brought before the courts are either criminal or civil. SCC deals with civil cases which involve breaches of obligation between two parties or recovery of property. The court's jurisdiction limit on money or personal property recovered is $300.

THE FIRST step in preparing a case for SCC is to go to the court clerk in the district courthouse and obtain a petition. The plaintiff then describes the claim to be brought against the defendant, the amount of money involved or value of personal property to be recovered.

A $5 docket fee is also required at the time the petition is filed. The docket fee covers the cost of an officer of the court to serve the defendant with a copy of the petition, informing him of the claim being filed against him.

The case must be heard within 90 days after the defendant has been notified.

The defendant has 20 days to respond to the petition, at which time he can file a counterclaim against the plaintiff. The counterclaim must result from the transaction taken by the plaintiff.

THREE TYPES of claims are not allowed in SCC: subrogation claims, involving insurance companies; assigned claims, involving collection agencies, and claims brought by parties other than those involved in the claim.

If the plaintiff wins the judgment of the court, the $5 docket fee can be recovered from the defendant.

If the claim is in excess of $300 and the plaintiff wants the case to be tried in SCC, the judge will allow the plaintiff to dismiss the action or to amend the petition to lower the claim to $300 and waive the excess money.

If the defendant's counterclaim is in excess of $300, three different actions are available, Davis said. He can demand judgment for $300 and pursue the extra amount in the second division of the district court, which has a jurisdictional limit of $3000. He can waive the amount over $300 or allow judgment over the plaintiff's claim and pursue his counterclaim in the second division of the district court.

A PERSON can't sue a resident of the state if the defendant doesn't live in the county where the petition is filed. The court doesn't expect a defendant to pay the cost of coming back to defend himself due to the limited amount of money involved in SCC.

The plaintiff can file a petition in the county where the defendant resides, although the action originated in another county. Also, if the plaintiff knows a day when the defendant will be returning to his county, he can have that person served a petition on the day he arrives, informing him of the claim.

If either party fails to appear in court on the specified day the judge may grant a default judgment to the attending party or dismiss the case.

AFTER JUDGMENT, either party has the right to appeal to district court within 10 days. During that period, the judgment of the SCC isn't binding.

According to Davis, on July 1, 1977, a new law went into effect for SCC. If the appellant loses his appeal to district court then he might be obligated to pay for the appellee's legal fees, Davis said.

If after 10 days the case hasn't been appealed, the defendant must adhere to the judgment of the court. If he fails to do so the plaintiff can hire legal council and ask SCC to enforce the judgment.

THE COURT can recover the debt by garnishing the defendant's wages, bank account or by attachment to personal property, excluding non-exempt personal property (provisions for the family and tools of the trade valuing up to $500). The judge must issue a writ of execution to a court official who attempts to collect the defendant's money or available assets that he owes the plaintiff.

Before the trial the court does not allow garnishing the defendant's wages before judgment, either party to hire legal advice before judgment or discovery.

Discovery is asking certain questions of the opposing party before the court case which could be used against that person in court.

In preparing for the trial, the plaintiff and defendant should gather all legal papers, bills, receipts, written agreements and witnesses that are pertinent to the case.

The court operates informally, Davis said. Each party is given time to explain their side of the case and to question the opposing party or any witnesses they may have. After hearing both parties, the judge can either announce his decision immediately after the trial or take it under consideration for several days.

A person can't file more than five claims a year in the same court according to the Kansas Small Claims Procedure Act, Davis said.

Once a claim has been filed it remains active for five years for written contracts, three years for oral contracts and two years on claims of personal property.

Psychology department conducts sexuality studies

Sex studies are taking place at K-State. In Anderson Hall, no less.

The psychology department has been conducting sexuality studies for the last few years under the direction of William Griffitt, professor of psychology, who is writing a textbook on human sexuality.

He and his graduate students conduct varied research on three main topics: the effects of erotic arousal on social behavior, people's perception of others after sexual arousal and stereotypes of male and female sexuality.

"The research we do is behavioral and pencil and paper-type things," said Luis Garcia, graduate in psychology. "We aren't concerned with the physiological or clinical aspects of sexuality."

One of the techniques used by the psychology department is to show arousing movies or slides to a subject and then study the person while being interviewed by a member of the opposite sex.

SOMETIMES AFTER viewing the films, the volunteer is asked to rate a member of the opposite sex. The studies have shown that when sexually aroused, people generally tend to perceive the opposite sex as more attractive than they actually are.

In the studies of sexual stereotypes, erotic material is shown to the person who is then asked to rate it according to how stimulating they think it would be to the opposite sex.

"Males tend to be fairly accurate about female reactions but females usually overestimate the male's reaction," Garcia said. Males usually base their projections on their own responses while females do not, he said.

Garcia said many people wonder about the ethics of such studies.

All the psychology experiments and visual materials are screened ahead of time by an ethics committee and the participants know beforehand what the experiment involves.

If the subject should choose not to participate or leave during the experiment, he still receives full credit anyway.

As to whether sex and love should be studied at all, Garcia said he believes it is a matter of personal opinion.

William Acker dead at 82

William Acker, 82-year-old father of K-State President Duane Acker, died early Thursday morning at a retirement center at Atlantic, Iowa.

Funeral services will be at 2 p.m. Sunday at the Roland Home for Funerals in Atlantic with burial following at the Atlantic Cemetery.

President Acker's father was born in Atlantic July 6, 1895, and had lived in the community all of his life. He farmed about seven miles northeast of Atlantic for about 40 years and then was a rural mail carrier for 14 years before fully retiring about five years ago.

Mr. Acker is survived by four brothers; by a daughter Lorraine Rasmussen of Santa Barbara, Calif.; and by his son Duane Acker. There are four grandchildren.

He had been in excellent health and only this past weekend had been in Colorado to visit a granddaughter.

"Two guys a couple of days ahead of us came out in flesh-covered wigs and girdles, standing in a huge plastic bag with a hose coming out of the top—I know that's kind of hard to imagine—and they called themselves the Embryo Twins," Stryker said. "And they sang Paul Anka's 'Having My Baby.'"

The experience was one Stryker said he will not soon forget.

"It was a lot of fun," he said, "but I don't think it will help me get into dental school."

ERA debate creates chaos in Wichita

By VELINA HOUSTON
News Editor

WICHITA—The Equal Rights Amendment forces got their way at Kansas Women's Weekend. In part, at least.

The ERA resolution won with a 1149 to 942 vote early Sunday, but several hours later the informal coalition of anti-ERA forces won their own substantial victory.

Of the 20 delegates elected to represent Kansas at the National Women's Convention in Houston November 18-21, only seven are members of the International Women's Year (IWY) slate and pro-ERA. The other 13, according to Nancy Harrington, president of Wichita's Stop ERA, are members of the pro-family coalition. No write-in votes were allowed.

REPRESENTATIVES of the Mormon Church, Stop ERA, Citizens Against ERA and the pro-life group constitute the informal pro-family coalition, Harrington said.

The entire conference from the Friday preliminaries to adjournment at noon on Sunday, was increasingly chaotic and the language laden with emotion.

A total of 1,700 had been estimated to attend. By 2 p.m. Saturday, that speculation had turned into a reality of about 4,600 men and women, exclusive of numerous unregistered observers. Only one anti-ERA sign-carrier was in the crowds.

"Kansas has already made a decision on ERA," said Gloria O'Dell, IWY Coordinating Committee member. "We hoped (at the conference) to get to other issues that needed some attention legislatively. Having a controversy over ERA does not negate it."

BALLOTS totaled 3,404. Seventy-three more had been issued, but according to the tallies, they had probably not been cast because people were not familiar with the nominees' names as no information on them had been posted in the voting area.

Many didn't get a chance to vote because they remained on the floor so as not to lose their seats and therefore the general session vote. Century II's Exhibition Hall has a capacity of 2,500 and many registrants were not able to get into the general session because of this.

The Friday preliminaries began with mass confusion due to the unexpected numbers of registrants. An overcrowded elevator in the Holiday Inn Plaza, headquarters for the conference, fell several floors with 12 people suffering minor injuries.

A gay lifestyles workshop Friday night erupted into a confrontation between pro and con forces when opponents of gay rights attempted a takeover of the proceedings in order to vote in a resolution favorable to the opposition.

THE POLICE were called to disperse the crowds, but made no arrests.

"This (gay confrontation) was the peak of harassment," said Diane Lewis, vice chairman of the IWY Steering Committee. "Several parliamentary tactics were used to stop the meeting. The police didn't do anything, but hold the doors open."

The anti-gays passed a resolution against homosexuality later Friday night and introduced it as a priority resolution in Saturday's general session.

Second District U.S. Congressman Martha Keys "sounded like Louis Armstrong," as O'Dell reported, and had to cancel her key note address.

Kansas Women's Weekend was officially called to order at 9:20 Saturday morning in the first of two general sessions. Lt. Governor Shelby Smith gave brief nonpartisan comments followed by an address from Addie Wyatt, an IWY commissioner from Chicago.

"The himness and the herness have separated us from the themness," she said. "The perfect state of the union is when we can present to our nation, our children and our children yet to come, that themness I speak of."

ACCORDING TO the convention rule II-10, debate on each resolution was limited to 10 minutes. An amendment from the floor extended the limitation to 15 minutes per resolution.

The Resolutions Committee had announced priority resolutions from the workshops would be considered in the first round, the pre-filed resolutions of the IWY Coordinating Committee in the second round and open resolutions from the floor in round three.

They didn't get that far. The pro ERA's accused their opponents of their using stall tactics and the pro-family coalition accused them of taking over the conference.

"The whole conference was obviously biased," Harrington said, after voting on resolutions ended early Sunday morning, barely completing round one's resolutions.

"Ms. Storey (presiding officer for the general sessions and assistant to Gov. Bennett) was biased and no one ever personally contacted out people to see if we were interested in serving on the IWY state coordinating committee."

"To my knowledge, most of the coordinating committee is made up of people who support the ERA. None of our people were invited," said Betty Hanicke, Kansas chairman for Stop ERA.

"It seems the largest groups of people being discriminated against by the supporters of equal rights at this meeting are those of us with opposing views," she said.

GLORIA STEINEM, a leading supporter of equal rights for women and editor of Ms. magazine, appealed to the registrants for a balanced slate of delegates.

Federal law mandates it be geographically, religiously, ethnically and in terms of age, race and economic status, she said.

Of the 20 delegates, 15 are white, two are Chicano, two are black and one is Indian-Hispanic. All are women between the ages of 26 and 55.

These delegates will take the Kansas Plan of Action to the national convention. The plan is a compilation of all the priority resolutions which came out of the workshops and were voted on during the general session. The women are not bound to the resolutions, Lewis said, but must present them as a representation of the sentiment at Kansas Women's Weekend.

"The only resolution won by the pro-family coalition was on the issue of rights for women in arts and humanities," Lewis said.

Other issues on which resolutions were passed are child care, women in crisis, sexism in education, employment, making homemakers a profession, teenage pregnancy, support from Congress on the United Nations Voluntary fund, media images of women, business and legal rights for rural women, support for women in politics, women in welfare and the legal status of women. All these resolutions passed in favor of the pro-ERA forces.

AFTER THE conference had been officially adjourned Sunday afternoon, Lewis and O'Dell reflected on the weekend's events.

"In view of the participation at the conference," Lewis said, "This does represent a feeling in Kansas and certainly the attitudes of people who were there. The delegates are a good mix in terms of people throughout the state. We have good racial and ethnic representation also."

Gunfire exchange wounds Mexican, San Diego police

SAN DIEGO (AP)—Two Tijuana policemen were seriously wounded when they provoked an international gunfight by crossing the border in pursuit of three undercover San Diego officers and assaulting them even after they identified themselves, authorities here said Sunday.

The incident follows by less than two weeks the firing of several dozen Tijuana police officers by Chief Antonio Escobedo Gomez, who began the shakeup after Mayor Marquez Arce was accosted by Mexican officers when he posed as an illegal alien to investigate border problems.

TIJUANA city police officials declined comment on the shooting, but Robinson said the Mexican department "is being extremely cooperative in helping us sift through this incident." San Diego Police issued the following account.

Three members of the task force, including the supervisor, Sgt. Jesus Lopez, were conversing across the border fence with two Mexican nationals in Tijuana about 10 p.m. PDT Saturday "when a marked Tijuana police car containing two uniformed police officers pulled up and arrested the Mexican nationals."

"Sgt. Lopez and the other officers then left the area of the border fence and went approximately 20 yards further into the United States."

"One of the Mexican officers shined a light on them and ordered them to return to the border. When they failed to do so he pointed his revolver at them and stated that if they would not return he would kill them."

"When Sgt. Lopez and his men hid in the bushes both Mexican officers crossed the border into the United States walking under a washed out section of the fence. One Mexican officer then advanced toward the area where Sgt. Lopez was hiding."

"At which time Lopez exited from behind the bush and holding his badge in his hand identified himself as a San Diego police officer. The Mexican officer continued to advance and then struck Lopez in the chest with his gun. The sergeant ducked and then turned just as the Mexican officer fired one shot" which left the sergeant uninjured after it glanced off his bullet-proof vest covering his right shoulder.

"At that time Lopez and other members of the task force returned fire and the Mexicans continued shooting," wounding Chacon.

Getting a job: interview, resume, image are important

By STEVE CARTER
Collegian Reporter

Filling out a resume or preparing for a job interview can be time consuming, but when done carefully, can be beneficial in getting a job.

"Students should take time to go to the library and read some books on interviewing and resumes before starting. This will give them a scope of ideas about the subjects," said Bill Zelazny, personnel director for the City of Manhattan.

"Before writing a resume you should sit down and analyze yourself; strengths, weaknesses, accomplishments and where you want to go in life," Zelazny said.

When coming out of college with little job experience, a resume should show that the job hunter is a teachable person, a hard worker, can analyze problems and get along with people, Zelazny said.

RESUMES WILL likely be sent to people 10 to 30 years older than the college student so they should be typed in a conservative manner on white or pale beige paper. The best type of resume is one that uses the techniques employed by graphics students. It should be clean with plenty of white space in the margins and almost in outline form.

The biggest mistakes made on resumes are detailing only courses and jobs; poor construction, and wasting time on things that don't count, Zelazny said.

A resume should include personal information, education in ascending or descending order, significant courses taken, degree received and heavy emphasis on any research, accomplishments, or honors received.

IF A PERSON is writing for a certain position he might want to add a statement of the objectives he expects out of the job, Zelazny said.

Before an interview, a person should look for information about the employer. This information is available in a library or through corporate reports published by the company. Job hunters should also analyze themselves from all aspects.

"Students should decide what they need out of a job to be happy whether it be money or social needs, and in what part of the country they want to live," Zelazny said.

There are three types of interviews that are used: person-directed interview, which is a list of questions directed at the interviewee; conversation interview, and the bully interview, according to Zelazny.

In the bully interview, the interviewer is curt. "It's to unnerve the interviewee and see how he handles himself in that type of situation," Zelazny said.

"Students should be prepared for general questions also. These you can be creative with and sell yourself," Zelazny said.

FOUR TYPES of questions are often used during an interview: Primary, secondary, which are follow-up to the primary; non-directed where they ask your opinion and direct questions aimed at persuading opinion.

"After being asked a question you should take a couple seconds to formulate your answer and then state it concisely, but thoroughly," Zelazny said.

Always answer questions during the interview in a positive manner — never come across with a negative attitude. The negative points the interviewer notices always carry more weight than the positive points, Zelazny said.

During an interview a person must show the interviewer that he is competent, honest, intelligent, likeable and interested in the company.

ZELAZNY recommended that men wear a conservative suit to an interview and if they don't own one, they should invest in one because it could be the difference in getting the job. Women should also wear something conservative.

"I don't mind women who wear pants suits to an interview, but some interviewers do," Zelazny said.

There are many ways the job hunter can obtain interviews: major city newspaper advertisements, placement centers, professional journals, contacting a certain company personally, employment agencies, scattering 500 to 1,000 resumes throughout the country to different companies and by talking to friends who are professional people and let them know you're in the market for a job.

K-State to begin psychohistory program

K-State and the Menninger Foundation will be conducting a new graduate training program in Psychohistory this fall.

"The program is designed for two kinds of people; those students earning a MA or PhD in history who want to specialize in psychohistory, and those students who are taking an advanced degree elsewhere but want some additional training to supplement their work," said George Kren, professor of history and director of the psychohistory program.

The program is supported by a pilot grant of $50,000 from the National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH). The grant will primarily be used to pay part of the salaries of the faculty involved in the program, to bring in experts in the field to lecture and to provide stipends for the students enrolled in the program.

"We had to apply twice for the grant," Kren said. "The first time the referees on the board of the NEH thought that psychohistory wasn't a legitimate field, we didn't ask why they accepted our proposal the second time."

Psychohistory is the study of the human past with the application of psychoanalytic methods.

"Psychohistory is a rational way of studying irrational behavior," Kren said. "More and more things have been happening in recent years that don't make a lot of sense. Psychohistory is a way of trying to understand why people did what they did."

KREN SAID the availability of specific psychohistorical literature on childhood and collective behavior are important in studying historical figures. Individuals singled out for study usually include Adolf Hitler, Leonardo da Vinci, Martin Luther, Henry VIII and Richard Nixon.

"We got together with the Menninger Foundation because there are certain facilities we lack and vice-versa," Kren said. "We had certain strengths that, if we combined them, it would make the program unique."

"We became interested in starting a psychohistory program because we were aware of the absence of any psychohistory program in the country," John Fitzpatrick, coordinator at the Menninger Foundation said. "There are courses offered at various universities but only UCLA and K-State offer a formal degree, and we are the only program funded by the NEH."

Fitzpatrick said there would be about five students accepted into the program the first year and that they would be selected on practically the same basis as other graduate students in history. If the regular grant goes through next spring they will accept four or five new students into the program each year. Students will be taking courses at both K-State and the Menninger Foundation.

The Foundation will have a practicum in clinical observation and the inference-making process. There will also be other courses available through the Menninger school of psychiatry.

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

With a sweltering heat wave refusing to relinquish its grip on much of the nation, poultry raisers predicted an above-average chicken mortality rate, parade marchers collapsed and forest fires raged in Montana and Utah on Sunday.

"Chickens can't sweat like humans or horses," said Rex Thompson, a manager at the Perdue Farms in Salisbury, Md. "They gasp for air and drink a lot of water at first. Then they just sit down and give up."

At Jones Beach, about 25 miles east of Manhattan, Guy Lombardo and his Royal Canadians drew a record crowd of 8,442 to their production of "Finian's Rainbow" Saturday night and a record gross of $54,342, the highest amount collected in the 24 years the Marine Theatre has been in operation.

One reason for the smash, Lombardo said, was that the temperature there was in the 60s. The blanket concessionaire made record rentals—346 blankets at $1 a blanket.

WASHINGTON—Employment in city governments across the nation decreased 2.5 per cent in the year ending October 1976, the first decrease since 1962, the Census Bureau reported Sunday.

During the same period, city government payrolls showed the lowest rate of increase since 1962, the report said. No reason for the decrease of city employees was mentioned in the report.

In October 1976, education and police functions accounted for more than one-third of all municipal employment.

ANCHORAGE—Interior Department investigators say they know of no major problems that would prevent them from approving resumption of oil movement through the trans-Alaska pipeline.

That means oil could begin flowing early this week through the 800-mile line that has been shut down since July 8, when an explosion killed one workman and destroyed Pump Station No. 8.

A final decision on the timing of oil flow will be made in Washington on Monday. The Interior Department has said it would not allow the line to resume operation until the agency is assured no further such incidents will occur.

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador—Right-wing terrorists have threatened to kill 50 Jesuits unless they leave El Salvador, but the Roman Catholic priests say they will remain to help the nation's peasants fight exploitation.

In a statement accusing the priests of "Communist subversion," the White Warriors Union threatened to kill all members of the Jesuit order if they do not leave this Central American country by Thursday.

"The executions will be immediate and systematic," said the clandestinely distributed statement from the group, reportedly made up of retired army officers linked with government security forces.

The threat against Jesuits comes at a time of mounting confrontation between the church and El Salvador's military government, which has ruled almost uninterrupted since 1932. It is controlled by a few families who own 60 per cent of the land in this country of 4.5 million people, 90 per cent of them Roman Catholics.

TOPEKA—One of four escapees from a minimum security area of the Kansas State Prison at Lansing was recaptured by the Shawnee County Sheriff's men in Topeka early Sunday.

The four escaped through a window of a ground floor exercise room at the minimum security facility early Saturday.

House will consider grain price support

WASHINGTON (AP)—The House expects to spend much of this week debating and refining proposed new programs for protecting the U.S. food supply and helping low-income families buy groceries.

At the same time, the Senate takes up a $111.4 billion defense bill and is expected to eliminate a $1.4 billion which was to have gone for the now scrapped B1 bomber.

Some of the uncertainty about the agriculture and food stamp bill was eased last week when President Carter said he would accept higher 1977 price supports for wheat and corn growers.

CARTER has said he would veto an agriculture bill as costly as the nearly $13.8 billion bill already passed by the Senate. The House version is now pegged at $11.9 billion for next year—$5.6 billion for the food stamp program and $6.3 billion for farm supports.

The President told a group of senators last Thursday that he hoped now to avoid vetoing the eventual compromise proposal because of costs. He later told Agriculture Secretary Bob Bergland he could go along with the House Agriculture Committee's grain support proposals.

But the White House continues to oppose several of the bill's provisions including what it calls a "nationwide program of busywork" for food-stamp recipients who can't find jobs.

THE BILL, which extends agriculture price supports and the food stamp program for four years, was scheduled to be taken up by the House on Tuesday and House leaders say the debate could last through the week.

Some Republicans want the measure split in two. They say the bill is too big. An explanation of the bill by the committee that has been handling it comes itself to 1,234 pages of small print, and more than 50 floor amendments have been prepared.

The House also was expected to act this week on a Carter-backed bill requiring states to allow voter registration on election day.

Aggieville parking; a solution exists

The Manhattan City Commission will have a chance Tuesday to begin correcting a problem which is almost as old as Aggieville itself: Parking.

A group of Aggieville businessmen will recommend that three metered parking lots be installed in the Aggieville business district to ease the growing parking problem.

In the petition, the group asked that the city pay one fourth of the cost of acquisition, demolition and lot preparation. Representing the group, attorney Paul Miller said the three proposed lots would bring 231 parking spaces into Aggieville. The meter revenue would cover the city's share of construction.

THE LOTS would be metered during the day, and Miller even suggested continuing the meter hours into the evening to boost revenues.

Parking meters were never intended to be a profit-making venture, the function is that of enforcing parking regulations. But if extending meter hours into the night will help entice the city to agreeing with the proposal, that's fine.

As a result of the inadequate facilities, nighttime Aggieville patrons resort to parking in front of residences, in parking lots owned by businesses which are still open or in private driveways.

THE SITUATION poses problems for businesses which remain open in the evening as well as for residents adjacent to Aggieville. It also leads to traffic congestion as students circle Moro and Laramie streets searching for a parking space.

The lots would be spaced out through Aggieville, and have the approval of more than half of the area landowners. The commission has recognized the need for additional Aggieville parking in the past, but hasn't acted on the proposal due to lack of information.

It now has that information. The Aggieville businessmen have presented a complete and workable plan to ease the parking and traffic problems, and commissioners should make every effort possible to improve the situation.

With more students driving now than ever, it's logical to assume the problem will only worsen until better facilities are provided.

Blackout; attitudes change

Last week's power blackout in New York City and its suburbs demonstrated how different things are in the United States today than they were 12 years ago.

On November 9, 1965, a malfunction at the power plant at Niagara Falls plunged the entire east coast into darkness.

People didn't know exactly what was happening to them, but they took the temporary inconvenience in stride.

Being a resident of New York, I well remember the help and assistance people were willing to offer to neighbors and friends.

Families stayed together, joking and laughing at the darkness which made them feel as if they were living during the early days of this nation. All the simple pleasures of life were gone and the people made the best of the little comforts they still had. For many of them, it was nothing more than an adventure, which everyone knew would eventually end.

THERE WAS the usual amount of looting and disturbances, but nothing to compare with the chaos that swept through New York City during the darkness last week.

During the 1965 blackout, police arrested about 100 people for looting and break-ins. Last week, unofficial estimates placed the number of arrests for looting and break-ins at about 3,500 for the 25-hour blackout period.

Numerous fires broke out and people were stuck in elevators and subways as the sweltering heat made tempers flare and patience short.

Instead of the episode being an adventure for the residents, it seemed more like an opportunity for them to steal their way to happiness and wealth.

But not all people were criminally motivated. As in 1965, people helped other people and tried to make the best of the inconvenience. If nothing else, the blackout proved that people do still care for others, while at the same time, some people just don't give a damn.

IF THERE can be a lesson to be learned from the blackout, maybe it is that New York can be paralyzed in a relatively easy way.

Con Ed, the power company that is responsible for the blackout, proved it is fallible.

The power plant that was reportedly struck by lightning causing the failure is located along the Hudson River just north of the city. If an angry country desired to put the city of New York out of commission, they would have to travel no further than to the Indian Point power plant and destroy just a small part of it.

By disabling the city of New York, they would also injure the rest of the nation. The blackout caused the closing of the New York Stock Exchange, Kennedy Airport and caused disruption to all major television stations. Trade was stopped, deliveries went undelivered and people were stranded in a dark, ominous city.

The incident once again proved that New York is still the heart of this nation. And it proved that people will either help others during troubled times, or take advantage of the unfortunate situation.

People will say that it could only happen in New York, but when it does, the rest of the nation feels it as well.

Letter to the editor

City offers forum on water-runoff

Editor,

The residents of Manhattan recently experienced a rain of approximately a 100 year return period. This caused a great deal of property damage and inconvenience due to the flooding of the streets which in many parts of the city was severe.

With a rainfall of that intensity and duration (almost four inches in an hour) it is to be expected that some problems would arise. The question is, should the flooding have been as severe as it was.

After talking with several lifetime residents of Manhattan I found that there are several locations in the city that quite often flood even in normal rainfalls. Knowing now where these locations were I went to the City Engineer's office and talked with the personnel about the problems facing the city and what plans were being made to remedy the situation.

THERE ARE areas of the city where the water is drained to an area that has no outlet thus ponding the water. This can become a very great concern if the water stagnates. Part of the problem with the north 3rd street area, which was my original concern, is that the original city area drains to this location. When the original city was built storm drains were only placed around the perimeter of 12 and 16 block areas with the streets being used to carry away the water inside these areas.

That may have been sufficient then, but with the greatly increased number of buildings and pavement we have today the runoff amounts are much greater as much of the water never has a chance to infiltrate. Increased development to the west of this area is now adding to the problem because the runoff occurs much faster and in much greater quantities when it comes off of buildings and pavement than when it runs off of grass which was formerly there.

The city does have Master Plan which includes proposals to remedy at least some of these problems. The City Engineer's office will present to the City Commission a program to point out the problems. This meeting will be Tuesday, July 26, at 7 p.m. in the Commission Room of the City Building. The public is invited.

This is one of the many opportunities we are blessed with in this country to take part of in forming the future of our surroundings by gathering the facts and making our wants and desires known to those we have selected to carry out those wants and desires. If you have never told the commissioners you are dissatisfied, don't complain because you are.

Christmas gift aids Kultgen to stardom

By EUGENE PERKINS
Collegian Reporter

When Mary Lou Kultgen was a freshman at Great Bend High School in 1969, Chris Keller, a senior, was the top woman tennis player in Great Bend as well as the top high school woman player in the state.

Kultgen decided she wanted to be as good as Keller, so that Christmas she took the money she had received as gifts and bought a $35 tennis racket.

"My parents were really mad because I spent the money on a tennis racket," said Kultgen, a senior in Health, Physical Education and Recreation, "but I guess it paid off."

IT PAID OFF with an outstanding high school tennis career.

It paid off in the summer of 1973 when Kultgen beat Keller in the finals of a tournament at Great Bend.

Sports

It paid off when Kultgen received a tennis scholarship at Barton County Community College in Great Bend. The Barton County women's tennis team placed sixth at the National Junior College Tennis Tournament when Kultgen was a sophomore.

Most recently, it paid off when Kultgen won the women's singles title at the Manhattan Open Tennis Tournament July 8 through 11, but Kultgen said she played better at the Fourth of July Tournament at Topeka where she finished second.

"I beat number one seed Jean Mills who is the best player at 35 and over in the Missouri Valley AAU tournaments and they raised a big hubbub about it on TV," Kultgen said.

Of the five tournaments Kultgen has played in so far this summer, she won three and placed second in the other two.

KULTGEN said she has been trying to practice at least four hours a day over the summer with her doubles partner, 14-year-old Susan Deam from Junction City. Kultgen and Deam won the women's doubles title at the Manhattan tournament.

"I go over to Junction City to practice with Susan," Kultgen said. "She has her own surfaced court and a ball machine."

Kultgen's husband, Bob, a senior in accounting, said he plays "some" tennis and the two have played mixed doubles in the tournaments this summer.

"We got second in one tournament," he said. "It was a big thing for me, but probably just an everyday thing for Mary Lou."

She alternated between playing number two and number three for the K-State's women's tennis team last year.

"My goal is to be number one for Kansas State and number one in the Big Eight this year," Kultgen said.

Kultgen said her chances of playing number one for Kansas State this year appear to be good. Last year's number one player, Becky Bueller, graduated, but more important, Kultgen said she is playing better now than she was during the spring season.

Facelift begins in Ahearn complex

By TOM FAULKNER
Collegian Reporter

Improvements on Ahearn are now underway, according to David O'Brien, Ahearn complex manager.

"A number of things are being done to get the fieldhouse to look better," O'Brien said. "We are painting the different sections tan and green with the stairways painted white."

According to O'Brien, the graphic design being used will eliminate confusion and get people upstairs to their seats.

"Basketball fans who are here year after year are aware of the facility setup, but for those who attend concerts they are not sure of where they are going," he said. "Hopefully this design will help the crowd flow."

IN ADDITION to painting the balconies in Ahearn, painting is also taking place in other areas of the complex.

"We are painting the men, women and faculty locker rooms, the weightroom, pool deck and new building hallways," he said. "That is a total of 25,000 square feet."

The painting of these facilities is to take place when summer school ends at which time the facilities will be closed until registration.

"We ask that everyone remove all clothing from lockers so paint doesn't get on clothes," O'Brien said. The deadline for removal of possessions is July 29.

ANOTHER reason for the improvements in the locker rooms is to prevent accidents.

"People have fallen and that can be treacherous. If we can work on the floor during this time, then the floor will have time to cure," he said. The floors will be painted with non-skid paint.

The project, which is funded from the state budget, will cost $82,700 and, according to O'Brien, this may be the only problem with the future remodeling.

"It is going to be hard to ask for that much money each year," he said.

Raydon Robel, Ahearn Complex director, announced offices in Ahearn will remain open and recreational activities will close. All locker rooms also will be closed.

Royals sweep Yankee series

KANSAS CITY (AP)—Amos Otis drove in three runs and Darrell Porter belted a two-run homer to give the streaking Kansas City Royals an 8-4 victory Sunday and a three-game sweep of the defending American League champion New York Yankees.

Porter's 415-foot shot off loser Ken Clay, 0-3, scored Otis ahead of him and staked Andy Hassler, 6-2, to a 2-0 lead in the second. After Al Cowens doubled home a run in the fourth Otis followed with a sacrifice fly.

In the sixth, the Royals pulled away when Pete Lacoock and Joe Lahoud drew walks from reliever Dick Tidrow and Otis lashed a two-run double to left.

Alcoholism surrounded by myths

By DEBBIE BURKLUND
Collegian Reporter

Alcoholism is a progressive disease, even if the alcoholic hasn't taken a drink for 10 years. "Enough longitudinal studies have been done to prove that," said Dennis Beitz, director of alcohol services in Manhattan. "Once you're an alcoholic, you're always an alcoholic."

The North Central Kansas Guidance Center in Manhattan defines alcoholism as a situation when the use of alcohol negatively affects some aspect of one's life. This includes physical, emotional, mental, spiritual and social effects. Other agencies have different definitions, Beitz said.

Disciplined drinking is controlled drinking, he said. Social drinking is when one's use of alcohol doesn't interfere with responsibilities to the self, the family and to the fellow man, he said. The difference between a heavy drinker and the alcoholic is the heavy drinker controls where he uses alcohol, when he uses it and how much he uses, he said. If the drinker lacks one of these, he is a problem drinker.

There are several myths about America's nine million alcoholics.

Only three per cent of America's alcoholics are the "skid row" type. There are more male than female alcoholics, although the number of women showing up in treatment statistics is increasing, Beitz said.

THERE IS ALSO a myth that alcoholics are middle-aged people. Forty per cent of the alcoholics today are less than 30-years-old. Studies indicate the number of high school and college students who are alcoholics increases every year.

Alcohol is not a stimulant, another common misconception, but rather a depressant. It reduces the effect of the part of the brain which controls the inhibition centers and puts that part to sleep, Beitz said. The effects of alcohol begin at the top of the brain and works down.

If a person continues to drink to excess, his breathing or heartbeat may eventually stop. What usually happens first is the person either passes out or vomits, Beitz said. These are the body's protective devices, but drinking depresses them, also.

Becoming sick is not the result of switching drinks.

"Usually what they get sick from is the amount of alcohol," Beitz said. Although the percentage of alcohol varies, the type of alcohol is the same in all drinks, he said.

"A can of beer, four or five ounces of wine and a mixed drink all have about the same amount of alcohol," he said.

Six per cent and 3.2 per cent beer both have about one ounce of alcohol in each can. There are just as many beer alcoholics as hard liquor alcoholics, Beitz said.

NOTHING CAN be done to sober an intoxicated drinker, even though many people believe coffee will. Coffee only produces a wide-awake drunk, he said, adding the only method that works to sober a drunk is time.

Eight out of 10 men over the age of 21 drink and six out of 10 women do. Most of these people are social drinkers with no alcohol problems. One out of 10 people who drink will become an alcoholic some time in his life.

About $20 billion a year is spent on alcohol, with beer being the most popular, Beitz said. He said 1,600 million gallons of hard liquor and 170 million gallons of wine are purchased every year.

This averages out to about nine quarts of alcohol per American per year, he said.

PEOPLE DRINK for many reasons. Among them are peer pressure, problems, drinking to be social, curiosity, tradition, celebration, taste and the "forbidden fruit" philosophy.

The characteristics an alcoholic displays fit individual situations, Beitz said.

"There are some characteristic symptoms, but they don't always happen or they may happen at the same time," he said. Problem drinkers tend to drink more in terms of quantity than social drinkers. They also drink more frequently and more rapidly than others.

Problem drinkers often experience blackouts, because the memory bank is put to sleep, Beitz said. A blackout is any time when a person doesn't remember drinking. It doesn't apply when the drinker only passes out, however. The more serious the drinking problem, the longer the blackout period.

ANOTHER characteristic of alcoholism is drinking to overcome hangovers. A problem

(.10 per cent alcohol content in the blood) from eight ounces of liquor in one hour on an empty stomach. It would take 10 ounces of alcohol for the same person to be legally drunk in an hour on a full stomach.

RESPONSIBLE drinking is never drinking on an empty stomach, Beitz said. A responsible drinker never takes a are family-centered and most of them live in respectable neighborhoods with the spouses. They pay their taxes, go to church and try to send their kids to college, Beitz said. The alcoholic's education and income are usually very low or very high, he added.

Alcoholism is the third largest problem in the United States after heart disease and cancer. Some of the long-term effects of alcohol include malnutrition, delirium tremens (D.T.'s) and damage to body organs. Prolonged drinking plus malnutrition can enlarge and weaken the heart and damage the liver, through a disease known as cirrhosis.

Studies indicate the number of high school and college students who are alcoholics increases every year.

drinker often drinks alone because of guilt feelings or to avoid problems with family and friends. He develops an elaborate abili system, Beitz said.

Alcoholics often try to cure themselves, but less than one per cent of the alcoholics can cure themselves with no help from others.

Alcohol isn't a food, even though it has calories. A person weighing 150 pounds would be legally drunk straight shot of distilled spirits, he said.

Fifty per cent of all highway accidents involve alcohol. At a .05 per cent alcohol blood content, driving is noticeably altered. Forty per cent of all arrests are involved in some way with alcohol including burglary, robbery, murder and rape cases.

"Alcoholics are regular people, like you and me," Beitz said. Ninety-five per cent of all alcoholics are employed. They Get a health checkup. Find out the lump in your throat is only emotion.

It's generally agreed that one of the best things you can do to keep yourself in good health is to have a regular health checkup.

The reason's simple. Cancer—if detected early enough—can often be cured. So even if your regular checkup does reveal a problem, in a way it's a good thing. You've probably caught it early enough to do something about it.

But the fact is, your checkup probably won't reveal anything serious. Most people who have regular checkups discover they're in pretty good health.

So have a checkup. Now. And regularly. Find out you're in better shape than you think you are.

It's a nice feeling.

Human rights violations halt South American weapons aid

WASHINGTON (AP)—The Carter administration is holding up sales of sidearms and other police weapons to Argentina, Uruguay, El Salvador and Nicaragua because of their records on human rights.

Sources at the State Department said there is concern the weapons, including tear gas and rifles, could be used by uniformed police or secret services to suppress dissidents and to brutalize demonstrators.

Licenses for the weapons are being delayed largely at the instigation of human rights officials, while over-all policy is under review. Other officials in the department support a resumption of sales to promote good relations with the foreign governments.

Up to $1 million in contracts are being blocked. Some sales to Guatemala also were delayed temporarily.

The unannounced holdup is part of the drive by the administration to promote human rights around the world, partly through cut-backs in U.S. military and economic aid.

ARGENTINA and Uruguay were targeted, along with Ethiopia, for cuts in arms assistance last February. Subsequently Brazil, El Salvador and Guatemala joined them in rejecting U.S. military aid.

The (Idaho) Deep: Searching 4½ feet of Jell-O for marbles

BOISE, Idaho (AP)—It was a dream-come-true for 19-year-old David Barron—jumping into a 4½-foot-deep, 600-gallon tank of gooey, lime-green gelatin to search for a marble squirming around at the bottom.

Barron, from Castleford, Idaho, found his marble, but not until he had slopped some of the shimmering mess over many of the 1,000 spectators who turned out for the unusual event Saturday afternoon.

"It was great," an excited Barron said afterwards, as dripping gelatin slid off his body. "I had this dream of an orgy in Jell-O and this is the closest I've ever been to it."

Gov. John Evans was invited to jump, but he was in the hospital after hip surgery until Friday. So in his place, Press Secretary Steve Leroy made the honorary first jump.

Leroy donned a wet suit, scuba tanks, mask and flippers, and flung himself into the gelatin to inaugurate the event.

He couldn't get to the bottom until two lifeguards removed his flippers, which were sticking up out of the gelatin. He said that when he got to the bottom, it was too dark to find a marble.

Museum gains historical jail

The 19th century Randolph Jail has been donated to the Riley County Historical Society and Museum (RCHS).

"Final decisions on how the jail can be utilized in the general historical area are being made now and will be announced this fall," said Jean Dallas, director of the museum. The decisions are being made by internal parties headed by the RCHS.

The jail was donated to RCHS by the Carl Ruthstrom family.

"The jail is presently located south of Randolph on private property," said Harold Bellman, mayor of Randolph.

"The jail is 8 feet by 12 feet and dates about 1880," said Sonie Liebler, member of the committee making recommendations on how to best use the jail.

"The heavy hardware on the door was handmade by a blacksmith," Liebler said. "Boards were laid flat on top of one another to give the building thickness. There are small barred windows on each side."

"There is one bunk and an old iron pot belly stove," Liebler said. "The jail is in good condition considering its age."

THE JAIL WAS used in the early 1900s to house criminals overnight. The sheriff would keep his prisoners in the jail before proceeding to Manhattan, Abilene or further west, Liebler said.

Although no site has been picked for the jail yet, the historical society believes the jail should be located in Pioneer Park in Manhattan.

"The inclusion of the Randolph Jail as a part of our (RCHS) permanent on-site collection would seem to be an asset," Liebler said. "In the future the organization might hope to acquire other historic structures representative of Riley County. Any building acquired would be displayed in an appropriate, meaningful and aesthetic manner in keeping with the historic image of Pioneer Park."

Similar old jails are on exhibit in the Kansas State Historical Museum, Council Grove and Larned. All are similar in construction to the Randolph Jail.

The building was approved for acceptance by RCHS as being structurally sound and interesting by the society's Historical Preservation Committee.

THE PARTY'S OVER.

All too often, when the party ends, the trouble begins.

People who shouldn't be doing anything more active than going to sleep are driving a car. Speeding and weaving their way to death.

Before any of your friends drive home from your party, make sure they aren't drunk.

Don't be fooled because they drank only beer or wine. Beer and wine can be just as intoxicating as mixed drinks.

And don't kid yourself because they may have had some black coffee. Black coffee can't sober them up well enough to drive.

FRIENDS DON'T LET FRIENDS DRIVE DRUNK.

If someone gets too drunk to drive, drive him yourself. Or call a cab. Or offer to let him sleep over.

Maybe your friend won't be feeling so good on the morning after, but you're going to feel terrific.

Heat sweeps through U.S., power plants under strain

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

FROM Long Island Sound to the Rockies, millions sweltered in temperatures of 90 degrees or more Monday as a prolonged 2,000-mile heat wave continued to tax power systems, threaten crops and kill poultry. The National Weather Service said no extended relief was in sight before Friday.

New York City, already under a water alert, recorded its sixth consecutive day of above-90 temperatures. At 100 degrees, it was the hottest day in 11 years.

Consolidated Edison, the power company whose generating failures had put the city through a 25-hour blackout only last Wednesday and Thursday, appealed to New Yorkers to conserve energy.

Forest fires blazed in Montana, Utah and Wyoming.

CINCINNATI remained under an air pollution alert declared over the weekend.

Columbia, S.C., has had temperatures in the 90s all month, and six consecutive days of over 100 degrees earlier this month. Farmers near there are pressing for disaster relief.

In Tennessee, officials of the Tennessee Valley Authority said their large power-generating system had already recorded its largest demand ever last Thursday—presumably from demand for air-conditioning—and it had to buy power from other areas to the northeast.

MORE THAN 80,000 chickens were reported dead of heat at two of the main poultry farms in the Delaware-Maryland-Virginia area.

The National Weather Service said the heat has been caused by a high-pressure system bringing hot, moist air from the South into an area stretching from the Rockies to the Eastern Seaboard.

Temperatures turned a bit cooler Monday in Missoula, Mont., giving hope to a crew of 200 workers trying to contain a 1,400-acre forest fire above Pattee Canyon just southeast of the city. A spokesman said the fire might be fully contained within a day.

Steinem sees gains for women

Editors note: This is the first of a two-part story on the Kansas Women's Weekend, held last weekend in Wichita.

By VELINA HOUSTON
News Editor

WICHITA—If you're talking about individual women, then the women's movement is clearly going forward, Gloria Steinem said at a Saturday afternoon press conference here.

Steinem, editor of Ms. magazine and a leading supporter of equal rights for women, said that in terms of the populace, the movement is gaining strength even more quickly.

The significance of Kansas Women's Weekend is it is the first major meeting for women supported by tax dollars, she said in an address to the general session that evening. She said the interaction of women at the conference would build networks of communication which she hoped would last a long time.

She called the five million in tax dollars which is funding the state conferences an "adequate amount."

"Five million is probably as much as it takes to buy the ashtrays in the Pentagon. Break it down between the states and you see a lot of volunteer work (was necessary)," she said.

THE STATE conferences she has been observing are more representative than the U.S. Congress, she said.

She said President Carter told her to tell the Kansas participants that "women's rights are part of the overall worldwide drive for human equality and that he supports and will continue to work for the Equal Rights Amendment."

"In New York," Steinem said, "we expected 3,000 women, at the most five, but we got 11,000. Women had to stand in line for four, five, six even seven hours and yet they did it."

It is the dispelling of bad imagery concerning women which has helped women to come together, she said in reference to stereotypes of women.

SOME of the stereotypes with which she was concerned included a misrepresentation of the feminist stand on abortion, pornography and the image of the homemaker.

"We honor the women who do work at home," she said. "Work is so important we think men should do it, too."

According to Steinem, a woman must be free to choose when it concerns her own reproductive system and women must protect that right for each other, regardless of what our individual views may be.

"The point," she said, "is not being pro-abortion but, on the contrary, being pro-choice."

STEINEM SAID some Chinese women whom she talked to in California were absolutely outraged that people would dictate what the private lives of others ought to be when they were told of the abortion and sexual preference debates.

"There is a notion in the masculine press that a woman in the movement 'does it more,'" Steinem said. She noted maybe that image was responsible for the idea the women's movement was pro-pornography.

"It is anti-woman propaganda. It preaches violence or torture against women," Steinem said. "Porn comes from the Greek word meaning harlot or prostitute."

According to Steinem, it is the "drug" of male-supremacy which is at the core of many women's problems.

"Men have to have this drug," she said. "When unable to get it, they turn to our children for fulfillment. The need for this drug is the same, whether inflicted on women or children."

ON CLASS and social status, Steinem pointed out that women are not of the same classes to which the men to whom they are attached belong.

In a gesture of "age liberation," Steinem told the audience she was 43.

"The last time I was in Kansas, a woman told me I didn't look 43," she said. "I said who knows what 43 looks like, we've been lying for so long."

SOME of the problems she said she saw in the conference were a misuse of parliamentary procedure for the purposes of harassment and stalling, groups who did not participate and came only to cast votes and bullet-voting, which she defined as someone instructing large blocs to vote a certain way.

"At the other conferences," she said, "conservative groups have tried to take the conferences over and turn them into something they weren't meant to be." She used as an example the Mississippi slate of delegates. A takeover resulted in an all-white slate with many delegates identified as members of the Ku Klux Klan.

Another problem she cited was that a radical right against the ERA tried to slow down the proceedings with their focused impact on that issue alone.

"There is more virtue where there is more choice," Steinem said in closing. "We need men who need only go forward on their own talent and not on the suppression of others' (talents)."

A member of the informal pro-family coalition protested at the end of her address, saying he was "appalled" such a biased speaker would be brought in for a conference being paid for by tax dollars. Steinem came to Wichita free of charge.

Fall housing situation tight

Editors note: This is the first of a two-part feature examining the fall housing problems at K-State.

By NANCY DENNING
Collegian Reporter

Fall semester, with an estimated 18,250 enrollment, begins Aug. 29 and rumors are there won't be enough on or off-campus housing for students.

"You have to call the advertiser as soon as it appears in the paper or the apartment is gone," said Eugene Perkins, senior in secondary education and English.

"The problem lies in that over 18,000 students arrive on campus the same day and need a place to sleep that night," said Tom Frith, K-State director of housing.

To help combat this problem, the housing office in the Pittman Building will be open from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. for four Saturdays before the fall semester begins.

"We are doing this so that students can come to the housing office and meet each other and then try to find off-campus housing together," Frith said. "This also enables the student who works during the week an opportunity to find housing before fall semester begins."

THE FIRST Saturday meeting was July 16. Other sessions are planned for July 30, Aug. 6 and 13, Frith said.

"It is easier for two or three people to find an apartment than a single student," Frith said. "When the landlord says the rent is $250 with a $100 deposit this doesn't sound as frightening to a group as to a single student."

"There are 4,500 spaces in dormitories on campus, 576 Jardine apartments and 50 trailers," Frith said. "Presently there are 100 people with contracts and 100 people with applications on the waiting list. The 100 people on the applications list are just about assured of not getting space on campus," he said.

TO LIVE on campus, students are required to sign an academic year contract which is binding as long as they are enrolled as a full-time student, Frith said. The cost is a $25 application fee and $1,200 for room and board.

"The $25 application fee is used for general income and operating expense," Frith said. "We (housing) are completely self-supporting. Housing must meet all state requirements but does not get any state funds."

"Students have to reapply yearly to live on campus," he said. "If the $25 application fee and contract is received before the end of May each year the student is just about guaranteed the hall, room and his choice of roommate for the next school year."

CANCELLATION of contracts depends on the individual situation.

"There is a contract review committee made up of two students, two administrators and one non-voting administrator," Frith said. "They review the situation and take action one way or another. The problem with easily-broken contracts is if it's done for one it has to be done for everyone and that can run into real money for the housing department."

Students to go off-campus for fall housing

If on-campus housing is unavailable to the student, other avenues are open.

"There are enough spaces in Manhattan, the problem lies in getting the student into them," Frith said.

"I really didn't have any problem finding an apartment," said Cindy Railsback, graduate student in business. "I found it through my landlord."

"Presently we have 30 off-campus openings, with five to 10 openings coming in a week," said Douglas deMahy, off-campus housing officer. "These don't include apartment complexes."

There are still off-campus spaces available in many apartment complexes.

THE RENT for the various apartment complexes depends on a number of considerations. The level of the apartment, size, number of roommates, furnished or unfurnished, the apartment location and whether utilities are included in the rent are some of the considerations.

All apartment complexes require a lease, either for 12 months or for the school year, and a deposit. Rents vary from $200 to $300 per month. None of the apartment complexes have waiting lists.

"Plaza West has four vacancies for fall," said Benson Lundin, owner. "The lower level is cheaper than the higher ones because they have no balconies."

"It is cheapest to rent for the whole year," Lundin said. "Some students take out one-year leases and then sublease for the summer."

"Wildcat Inn has two rate schedules, one for 12 months and one for 10 months," said Robert Logan, owner. "There are no vacancies for fall, most have been rented since before spring break."

"Westborough has some two-bedroom unfurnished apartments still available for fall," said Rose Erbert, manager. "We don't keep a waiting list, it is first come—first served."

"Wildcat Creek has no rate change for an increase of roommates or the different levels," said Ellen Nixon, manager.

"There are some one-bedroom vacancies either furnished or unfurnished for fall."

"Royal Towers usually doesn't fill-up until a week before school starts," said Jay Walker, assistant manager. "After this we turn about 20 or 30 people away."

"It is not fair to keep a waiting list because there is just not going to be any room for them," said Marty Snyder, manager of Mont Blue Apartments.

Non-traditional study helps students overcome barriers

By DEBBIE BURKLUND
Collegian Reporter

Students with barriers to education can still receive degrees through the non-traditional study program (NTS) at K-State.

K-State's NTS program is oriented toward self-directed students who have clear educational objectives, but have encountered obstacles in meeting their goals. These obstacles include distance, physical handicaps, jobs and bureaucratic restrictions.

Some people, such as military personnel, move to often to meet traditional residency requirements for graduation. K-State, in conjunction with Ft. Riley, provides an opportunity to receive college credit at Old Trooper University at Ft. Riley.

NTS is administered through the Division of Continuing Education. Its academic policies are governed by a university-wide Committee of Overseers appointed by the Executive Committee of the Faculty Senate.

THE PROGRAM began in 1972 and the first participants graduated in 1976. NTS received permission at that time to grant a Bachelor of General Studies Degree within the program. The degree carries the same legitimacy as other K-State degrees.

There are two routes students may take in the NTS program. Route A is a method by which a student can meet the course requirements for a conventional degree. Students working toward these majors usually need about 120 credit hours to graduate. They have advisors in the NTS office and in the academic department of the major.

Route B is a competency-based program which leads to the Bachelor of General Studies degree. It serves those whose educational aims cannot be satisfied by a conventional major or whose main area of study cuts across two or more colleges within the University.

THIS ROUTE provides more flexibility for the student. Candidates for this degree are judged on readiness for graduation by the Committee of Overseers for NTS on the basis of general knowledge and skills, rather than on credits accumulated.

The program combines many approaches for earning credit or demonstrating competency. These include late afternoon, evening and off-campus courses, field study, independent library research, correspondence courses, intern or work study programs, residential seminars and Kansas Telenet courses.

There are about 65 students involved with the NTS program at the present, said John Steffen, director of the program. These students range from 23 to 66 years of age, he said. About two-thirds of these students are women. Most of the students have had some prior college work, he said.

Students in this program are eligible for financial aid under guidelines similar to those for other K-State students. Students may apply at any time of the year.

Each student's program is developed to fit his needs. Therefore, two things are important—the student's willingness to ask questions and make suggestions and the advisor's willingness to help the student find answers and resources.

WASHINGTON—Prime Minister Menahem Begin of Israel arrived Monday for talks with President Carter carrying a "complete Mideast peace plan" and expressing hope for a deepened friendship with the United States.

The 63-year-old one-time guerrilla leader is expected to ask Carter to shelve his proposals for a virtually total Israeli withdrawal from occupied Arab territories.

Begin said on his arrival from New York that he hoped U.S.-Israeli friendship "will deepen" and that during his visit progress "will be made to real peace."

Sources said that during visits in New York with American Jewish leaders, Begin expressed hope that Carter can be persuaded to drop his recommendation for an almost total Israeli withdrawal from the territories captured during the 1967 war.

But Carter is understood to hope the secret "peace plan" that Begin is bringing reflects a softening of the prime minister's determination to retain control of the west bank of the Jordan River and Gaza.

WASHINGTON—The Senate went along with President Carter's decision on the B1 bomber Monday and voted to cut $1.4 billion in production funds from a pending defense appropriations bill.

The vote was 59 to 36.

The Senate acted after a brief debate in which longtime supporters of the B1 program contended Carter made a serious mistake in his decision to shift to a reliance on the new cruise missile to be fired from updated B52 bombers.

Money for the B1 bomber was included in the $111 billion defense appropriations bill passed by the House before Carter announced his decision. The matter will have to be resolved in a House-Senate conference.

LOS ANGELES—Andrew Daulton Lee, convicted of selling national secrets to the Russians, was sentenced Monday to life in prison by a judge who said young people should realize espionage "is a game you do not play for any purpose."

U.S. District Court Judge Robert Kelleher, noting that Lee could be paroled in 10 years, added an additional 15 years to the sentence on eight counts of espionage and conspiracy. He said the 15 years would run concurrently with the life sentence.

NEW YORK—As New Yorkers eyed their lights cautiously in sweltering heat Monday, the Great Blackout of '77 returned for a limited engagement as power failed in a small section of Manhattan's East Side.

The long process of arraigning alleged looters arrested during last week's city-wide power failure continued as hundreds of suspects were processed through the overcrowded court system.

Scattered power outages occurred along Second Avenue between 77th and 110th Streets last night when Consolidated Edison encountered "feeder cable problems," a spokesman said.

WASHINGTON—Interior Secretary Cecil Andrus Monday approved the resumption of oil flow through the Trans-Alaska Oil pipeline, shut down since a July 8 explosion and fire.

Pipeline operators immediately began the process of starting the flow of oil southward. The process was expected to take several hours.

The Interior Secretary said the department's Alaska Pipeline Office reported that the blast, which killed one worker and injured five others, was caused by human error, not defects in the pipeline itself.

"Accidents of this kind cannot be allowed to happen again," Andrus said.

Local reactions favorable to B1 bomber termination

By STEVE CARTER
Collegian Reporter

President Carter's decision to stop production of the B1 bomber in favor of B52s manned with cruise missiles will save $14 billion and maintain U.S. manned bomber strength.

"I would support the decision. It's too much money for the B1, which would be obsolete soon. Put the extra money in HEW," said Merlin Gustafson, associate professor of political science.

Carter's plan is to modify B52s with cruise missiles and equip them with the latest electronic devices to jam Soviet radar defenses. The cost for modifying 250 B52s is about $7 billion as compared with $25 billion to build 244 B1 bombers.

HERB HOLLINGER, public relations manager for Boeing in Wichita, said he foresees no effect on employment in either the Wichita or Seattle plants.

"We have about 1,600 people employed on B1 work in Seattle. There are about 1,100 employed in research and development and this work will continue until 1979. The other 500 people employed for production work on the B1 have been assigned to other jobs," Hollinger said.

"We haven't received any directions from the Air Force or the Department of Defense to proceed with any new work, so we don't see any increase in employment yet," Hollinger said.

However, Boeing is ready to begin production of the cruise missiles and B52 modifications if and when the chance comes.

CARTER'S decision could "possibly increase the need for pilots and navigators. The B1 was to take less manpower to maintain than the B52s," said Col. Clarke, Air Force ROTC.

"The B52 is an efficient and effective weapons system. It has proven that. With improved and updated avionics it can be as effective as the B1 bomber," Hollinger said.

GUSTAFSON said he also believes the B52 will be effective enough.

"Right now we have 38 strategic nuclear weapons for every Soviet city over 100,000 in population. We've reached the point of overkill," Gustafson said.

"We've been in a cold war for 30 years. The U.S. and USSR are in a trap. There are powerful interests in both countries that benefit from the arms race. When we up the ante, they counter," Gustafson said.

"The military is a powerful political clout. Statistics we get on the military strength of the Soviet Union need to be questioned—what type of ships, missiles, and troops do they have, not how many," he said.

Ag honorary wins achievement award

K-State's Gamma Sigma Delta, the international honor society of agriculture, won the 1977 Chapter Achievement Award. This award is given out yearly to the most outstanding chapter of the 36 chapters across the nation.

Michael Dikeman, president of Gamma Sigma Delta, said the objective of the award is to encourage high standards and a high degree of excellence in agricultural pursuits.

"One of the reasons we received the award was the high acceptance rate for membership we receive from the students," he said. "About 83 per cent of the students asked for membership accepted."

"We also give recognition to the outstanding freshman and sophomore, faculty member and teacher," Dikeman said. "We also attempted to help establish a chapter at Oklahoma State University. All of these activities contributed to our winning of this year's award," Dikeman said.

According to Dikeman, the basic purpose of Gamma Sigma Delta is to identify and recognize the outstanding persons in agriculture, biochemistry, veterinary medicine, foods and nutrition and physics.

ERA vs. the family?

The anti-ERA forces which gained power at the Kansas Women's Weekend are united under a banner calling themselves "pro-family."

They claim the Equal Rights Amendment, if accepted as an addition to the U.S. Constitution, will severely harm the institution of the family in this country.

The ERA is not designed to do away with the family. It's only a request for equal opportunity for women.

Some women desire more than a home and family. They want a career. And they want the opportunity to pursue that career with no discrimination barriers.

Women have been considered second-class citizens in the world of employment; either working in jobs below their capabilities, or receiving less pay for work equal to men's.

Although civil rights legislation already on the books is supposed to eliminate discrimination, it hasn't been successful where women are concerned, thus the need for the ERA.

WOMEN who wish to stay home and raise families will still be able to do so. There is nothing about the amendment which advocates the dissolution of the family.

Anti-ERA persons cry out about the possibility that women will have to face combat, will be drafted into the Army if the E.R.A. is accepted. This is a remote, very remote possibility, but if it should come to be, women are just as capable of serving in the armed forces as men. In Israel, women have long stood beside men in battle, and the family in Israel hasn't suffered.

Another argument brought forth by the anti-E.R.A. forces centers around the use of toilets. If the E.R.A. passes, they cry, men and women will have to share public facilities. The foundation of this argument is shaky, at best. The basic moral fibre of this country will not allow such an occurrence.

All the E.R.A. asks for is equal rights, so women who wish to work, can. The women who wish to stay home can, too.

E.R.A. advocates are only asking for a chance to be treated equally.

Gong Show revisited

WICHITA—I hate to say it, but Kansas Women's Weekend was almost like a political Gong Show—chaos and confusion to the point of it all being depressingly humorous.

Different groups presented their "acts" and tried to win points from the voters. And Madame Chairman gonged away with her gavel, frequently declaring speakers "out of order." A majority of voters lacked a knowledge of parliamentary procedures and had to succumb to the tactics of those well-versed in them.

A little old woman grew very upset when Madame Chairman gonged her and explained her statement was not a point of order.

"You're going to have a point of something else, if you don't watch it," the lady said quite angrily.

A MAN stood up and said men were being discriminated against because there were no men's restrooms. Actually, there were, but the ratio of women to men was so large the women had taken over both bathrooms.

Madame Chairman's reply was "Sir, I think there's a lot of offers to escort you at any time." Betty Hanicke, Kansas chairman for Stop ERA, was seen leaving a bathroom clearly marked "Men."

At one point, a speaker from the floor addressed the International Women's Year Coordinating Committee as "ladies" and used a tone of voice which implied a very loosely applied usage of the term.

One man complained the committee was wasting time and the chairman replied, "If you would quit coming to the mike so often, we would get things done."

Another voter went to the mike to say, "This reminds me of Animal Farm," but was drowned out by various boo's and rah's from the congregation.

When the chairman was trying to clear the aisles so voting could begin on one of the resolutions, she singled out a man in a brown shirt and asked him to sit down. When he did, she said, "Thank you. He found himself." Then she added, "Excuse me, I mean he found his chair."

DURING THE ERA debate, a woman stood up and said, "If ERA is passed, all single women should be pushed to use contraceptives and have no babies."

Chants of "No Way, ERA!" filled Exhibition Hall as the voting on the ERA resolution took place. As the chairman told the congregation how beautifully they had behaved, a woman began shouting, "May God curse you with eternal damnation! Eternal damnation!"

People were searching hard for biases to attack and were very unlistening of each other's points of views. Ignorance of parliamentary procedure and uncontrollable emotion from both men and women added to the zoo.

Another thing I found upsetting was the reciting of the Pledge of Allegiance. Many feminists stood eeking out a pledge to a country in which there is "liberty and justice for all." The irony is disgusting. I mean, why say a pledge which, by your very presence, you are saying you don't believe in?

I generally pay no attention to the stereotypes attached to women and dismiss them as old-husband tales. Many, however, came true in nightmare fashion last weekend. Had men organized it, I doubt it would have run any more smoothly. Nevertheless, that doesn't turn the nightmare back into the resolute dream it was supposed to be.

Forced retirement not always best

For many Americans, turning 65 means going out and buying a recreational vehicle and using home as a brief stopping place between vacations. They've worked a long time, they want a rest and they deserve it.

But for the other part of America turning 65, mandatory retirement is looked upon as a sweeping out of dead wood, a turning out to pasture and a violation of their right to work. They want to keep working because they like it or because they have to.

What kind of a society is it when a worker turns 65, is given a $30 fishing pole and is told to "go relax" whether he wants to or not?

It seems the only workers who aren't forced to retire at 65 or 70 are legislators, judges and presidents, some of whom languish in senility while running this country.

But it's the federal system which is perpetuating this problem through huge social security and medicaid programs while spending little on employment programs for the elderly.

Aptly, it's also the government which is trying now to remedy the problem. Through congressional hearings and investigations, lawmakers are discovering that retirement is more a nightmare than a dream for many. Congress is finding out that mandatory retirement is little more than a social decision about the worker's future.

For those who are not independently wealthy or who don't have an outstanding pension plan, retirement means an actual decline in the lifestyle they're used to. A gold watch won't buy groceries, nor will it put a child through school. The Ozzie and Harriet lifestyle is an unrealistic view of retirement, we know that now, but can anything be done to change it?

Steps are being taken in that direction. The House Education and Labor Committee approved last week a bill which would raise the mandatory retirement age in the private sector to 70, the present retirement age for most government employees. The bill has the support of Labor Secretary Ray Marshall and President Carter.

It would allow those who want to work to do so until they reach 70, and those wishing to retire before 70 would have that option.

But most important, it would help those who are forced into retirement against their will to keep working. There are millions of elderly who enjoy their jobs and aren't prepared to quit mere because they've reached an arbitrarily-set birthday.

The accomplishments of people older than 65 are notable in fields ranging from entertainment to social work to science. They have proven mandatory retirement policies to be a farce and have proven that social and economic productivity doesn't stop at 65.

It has been shown by the American Medical Association that mandatory retirement without considering mental and physical ability has been a deteriorating effect on a person's emotional and physical health, and often leads to early death. This is precisely the opposite of what mandatory retirement was designed to do.

With wise legislation and social planning, the elderly can achieve the dignity and pride they deserve rather than the humility and pain how thrust upon them.

Campus smoking policies have controversial history

By SHEREE LOWE
Collegian Reporter

Eight years ago students could not buy cigarettes in the K-State Union because of a state wide ban of cigarette sales on college campuses.

In 1969 cigarettes went on sale at the Union for the first time in five years. This occurred after the 1964 ban was repealed and campuses could obtain a license from the state to allow for the sale of cigarettes.

Eight years after the repeal of the ban, cigarettes are now still sold at the Union information desk, however smoking in classrooms and buildings on campus is a new concern of many.

"There was no smoking allowed any place on campus before the late 40s and at that time a bill was passed under K-State President Milton Eisenhower that allowed smoking on campus, but not in any of the buildings," said Case Bonebrake, director of Physical Plant.

CIGARETTE butt recepticals were placed within 15 to 20 feet of every building and cigarettes had to be extinguished before entering the building, according to Bonebrake.

"In the middle 50s the policy was changed to allow smoking in offices and certain laboratories, but smoking in classrooms and hallways was still prohibited," Bonebrake said.

"That restriction is still in effect, but by popular misuse is being abused," Bonebrake said.

Now there seems to be an unwritten policy about classroom smoking depending on the construction of the building and the attitudes of professors and students.

"The construction of a building determines whether no smoking signs are posted on the walls of classrooms," Bonebrake said.

THERE are nine buildings on the K-State campus that should not allow smoking for safety reasons considering the age of the buildings, according to Bonebrake.

"In the newer buildings on campus, smoking is permitted except where the instructor or students have personal objections," Bonebrake said.

With the prohibition of smoking in certain public places, the question of violation of constitutional rights had arisen.

"People have a general right to conduct their behavior in accord to others," said Nyles Davis, student attorney.

Another concern of cigarette smoking is its effects on non-smokers.

"Being in a room filled with smoke is the same thing as smoking," said Dr. Bill Zuti, assistant professor of health, physical education and recreation.

"The toxics can enter a non-smokers lungs depending on the concentration of the smoke," Zuti said.

Non-smokers need to possess the attitude that "you are violating my health if you are a smoker," according to Zuti.

Medically, people who don't smoke should have the priority if a restriction of smoking is being discussed, according to Zuti.

'Temporary' trailers provide office space

By EDMUNDE JEKAM
Collegian Reporter

After fire destroyed Nichols Gym in 1968 five trailers were acquired on loan from Washburn University as temporary housing for the displaced music faculty.

Today, about nine years later, the trailers, squeezed between Calvin Hall and Anderson Ave., are as permanent as the Union.

According to Paul Young, vice-president for university development, when K-State is through with the trailers it will discuss with Washburn University how to dispose of them. This, however, may not be in the near future because K-State suffers from a chronic shortage of space.

The music department still uses one of the trailers and three other facilities—education, business and the South Asia Center—have moved into the other trailers in the past few years.

THE TRAILERS do not have any running water and toilet facilities. Some of the ceilings sport several water stains from leaks in the roofs.

There are mixed feelings on the trailers among the trailers' occupants.

"It's not bad office space but we'd like a little more room," said Kenneth Jones, director of the South Asia Center.

The center mails newsletters throughout the United States and two-thirds of Canada, and uses "trailer A" as its address. Jones said he is not sure what kind of image this creates for the University.

ROBERT SHOOP, assistant professor of administrations and foundations in the College of Education, said he didn't mind having his office in the trailers as long as they are maintained.

"My main concern is to have a place to work with the students and this is good enough a place for me," Shoop said.

The adjacent Nichols Gym, also has an uncertain future.

According to Young, it was proposed that the gym would be converted into "a desperately needed" art gallery but funds have been hard to come by. He said it will cost about $4 million to accomplish the required construction.

Upward Bound to present talent show

An extravaganza of talent will be presented by Upward Bound students Wednesday at 7 p.m. in Union Forum Hall, according to Anthony Seals, member of Upward Bound.

There will be 55 students in the program, Seals said.

The program will consist of music, drama, skits, dance, puppet show, poetry recitals and a fashion show, with fashions provided by Jean Junction and Carousel.

"This will be the grand finale of our summer program," he said. "The next session will begin this fall."

The Upward Bound program, which has been at K-State for four years, is designed to help low income students achieve post high school education, according to Seals.

Racquet ball: Number 1 co-rec sport

By CINDY STEARNS
Collegian Reporter

Racquetball provides an excellent workout in approximately 30 minutes, requires endurance, skill and body control and utilizes nearly all parts of the body.

The game came from paddleball in the late 1940s and combines the skills of tennis with handball. Racquetball's first rules were adopted from handball.

In April, 1969, the name "racquetball" was officially adopted and the International Racquetball Association was formed.

Requiring less skill, racquetball is an easier game than tennis, said

David Laurie, assistant professor of health, physical education and recreation.

"Depending on the players though, singles racquetball is a better workout than tennis," said Bobbie Currier Nelson, graduate student in family and child development.

"I like racquetball better than tennis because when the other player is so much better in tennis, they don't seem to get as much of a workout as in racquetball," said Susan Spencer, junior in journalism and mass communications.

"My roommate asked me to play with her. I found it was fun to play and anyone can learn and have fun," Spencer said.

Sports

NELSON ALSO observed people of all ages on the courts. She said it's a good family game. Laurie said he has seen seven-year-olds playing with people up to 60 years of age.

Playing racquetball is based on skill and endurance. With skill depending on the person, women have as good a chance at winning as men, Laurie said.

"The game can be played co-rec easily, which is another advantage of racquetball over handball," Nelson said. The game is also inexpensive to take up. Most beginners buy a wood or metal racquet and there are also magnesium racquets.

"Racquets cost anywhere from about $7 to $95. You can get a good racquet for about $15 to $20," Laurie said.

Played indoors or outdoors on a one, three or four-wall court, racquetball can be played with two (singles), three (cutthroat) or four (doubles) people.

To start the game, the player stands in the service zone, striking the ball off the front wall. The server gets two attempts before losing service, Laurie said.

"Play is to 21 points and you can win by only one instead of two points as a lot of other games are," he said.

Although the only courts are located at the Washburn complex, both indoor and outdoor courts will be built at the new recreation complex, Laurie said.

"To get a court, you about have to go out at midnight or one in the morning," Laurie said.

"With the sport growing as it is, more courts would be nice," Spencer said.

"It's like a disease, like gambling; once you get into it, it's hard to give it up," Nelson said.

Baker named new Cat baseball head

Dave Baker, a Manhattan product, has been named head baseball coach at Kansas State.

The 34-year-old Baker fills the post recently vacated by Phil Wilson, who resigned to become athletic director at Fort Hays State.

Baker served as head baseball coach at Creighton University the past six years, guiding Bluejay teams to a combined record of 140 wins and 108 losses. His 1973

Creighton club advanced to the NCAA regional playoffs before being eliminated.

"We are most fortunate to add Coach Baker's talents to our staff," Jersey Jermier, K-State athletic director said. "He's an enthusiastic leader, and he's a proven winner."

BAKER GRADUATED from Manhattan High School in 1961 where he was a basketball standout his senior year.

DAVE BAKER. . .new K-State baseball coach.

He spent one year playing basketball at Coffeyville Junior College for current K-State coach Jack Hartman and transferred to K-State in 1965, playing one season of baseball for the Wildcats. He finished college at Emporia State in 1967 and 1968, where he was captain of the baseball team his senior year.

Baker served one year (1969-70) as head track and assistant basketball coach at Liberal Junior College before moving to Creighton as assistant baseball and basketball coach. After one year he was elevated to the head baseball coaching position.

"My goal at K-State is to build a little at a time," Baker said, "and I will start by stressing a strong fall program with emphasis on the fundamentals of the game."

American League battles to end National League supremacy

NEW YORK (AP)—Battling a losing streak and an injury jinx, the American League limps into tonight's 48th annual All-Star Game seeking a solution to the National League's almost total domination of the mid-season game.

The NL, which holds a 23-18 lead in the series, has won five in a row and 13 of the last 14 games. And Sparky Anderson, manager of the NL club, hopes to continue the trend by starting right-hander Don Sutton of the Los Angeles Dodgers against a battered AL team swelled by substitutes for side-lined stars.

Jim Palmer of Baltimore, the only starting AL pitcher originally selected for the team who stayed healthy enough to play, will be on the mound for the American League.

Three of the top AL pitchers chosen for the game, Mark Fidrych of Detroit, California's Frank Tanana and Vida Blue of Oakland, have been sidelined because of arm problems. Another, California's Nolan Ryan, turned down a request to serve as a replacement.

RESERVE infielder Don Money of Milwaukee also was scratched because of a bad back but outfielder Carl Yastrzemski of Boston, nursing a bruised instep, sent word that he would play.

Instead of Billy Martin, the American League All-Star team ought to have Dr. Marcus Welby as its manager.

"I'm here to give you the hospital report," joked AL President Lee MacPhail Monday as the starting lineups were announced.

Even after he rattled off the depressing list, MacPhail expressed confidence in his league's team. "Despite all our injuries, I still think we have an outstanding squad and we're going to break that losing streak," he said.

"When we beat them tomorrow night, ask Sparky if those American League guys are awesome," cackled Martin, remembering Anderson's reference to the "awesome" Cincinnati lineup last October.

"Hey, we were the biggest favorites to win the National League West and we're nine and one-half games back," said Anderson. "Anything can happen."

Murder case result may affect martial law in the Philippines

MANILA, The Philippines (AP)—A murder case that goes before the nation's highest court Tuesday challenges whether civilians can be tried in military courts. A verdict in favor of the defendant could shake the foundations of President Ferdinand Marcos' martial law regime.

The defendant is Noel Alvarado, 21, accused of shooting a judge to death in a Communist plot. He contends he was arrested illegally, tortured into confession and not charged for two weeks after arrest.

The Philippines Supreme Court has scheduled a hearing Tuesday on a writ ordering the government to bring Alvarado before the court and explain why he should not be freed.

The case challenges two frequent practices of Marcos' military rule: arrest of civilians by soldiers without warrants and the trial of civilians by military tribunals.

"It's a sweet little case," said a lawyer who has represented martial law dissenters. "It's going to be interesting to watch."

Marcos' chief lawyer, Solicitor-General Estelito Mendoza, said he is contesting the writ "on grounds that the arrest was valid and that Alvarado is now formally charged before a military tribunal." He added, "I don't think there'll be any difficulty with this case."

The president appoints all members of the judiciary and dissident sources agree with Mendoza that there is little likelihood the 13 members of the Supreme Court would rule against the regime. But the sources say the case differs from previous actions.

City Commission approves parking lots for Aggieville

By CHRIS WILLIAMS
City Editor

A controversial petition allowing for the construction of three new parking lots in Aggieville was approved last night at the Manhattan City Commission meeting.

The petition calls for the construction of lots at the corner of 11th and Moro, the corner of 12th and Laramie and the corner of north Manhattan and Laramie.

Commissioners Henry Otto, Terry Glasscock, and Bob Smith voted for the proposal with Robert Linder casting the only dissenting vote. Mayor Russell Reitz abstained from voting because of a conflict of interest.

Paul Miller, representing the merchants of Aggieville, said the project will cost about $440,000 with a 72 per cent land assessment to Aggieville merchants with the remaining 28 per cent cost due to the city.

MILLER said $315,000 will be used for acquisition of the property, $10,000 will be earmarked for the preparation of the land, and the remaining $119,000 will be used for the actual construction of the lots.

This represents an annual assessment of between $375 and $400 for the merchants and residents of Aggieville.

Miller said that under present city ordinances, the number of parking stalls that should be in Aggieville would number about 1,700. Miller added that even with the new stalls, the number of available parking spaces would total only one-third of what it should be.

TERRY RAY, who described himself as a "nighttime businessman", said the metering of the parking areas could support revenue bonds.

He also supported the proposal of metering the parking stalls during the nighttime hours.

Walter Selby, representing the elderly owners of a gas station that will be demolished to make room for the new lots, said the city should consider the "needs of the elderly" and recommended that the commission vote against the proposal.

Selby's wife, Mildred, said she "will be happy to see the day when all meters are eliminated from the city."

TOM DUNN, a property owner in Aggieville, opposed the proposal because he felt the police could not control the people who had been drinking in Aggieville and students could easily destroy the meters.

Otto said Dunn's remarks were a "most discouraging and distressing attitude toward our students."

Linder added that he knew of very few students capable of "sustained violence" and added, "If it comes down to violence, we should shut down Aggieville."

CHUCK JACKSON, an Aggieville liquor store owner, disputed the actual costs presented and said the lot at 12th and Laramie would be the only lot to gain parking spots.

He said the lot at 11th and Moro already had the spots laid out and the removal of the gas station at the north Manhattan and Laramie lot would gain "no more of an increase of 10 to 12 cars."

City attorney Ed Horne said the lots could be purchased either by way of voluntary purchase, gift or condemnation.

Smith recommended that future parking lot sites be considered outside the Aggieville area and also added that the city "use any available land in Aggieville," exemplified by its use of alleys and sidewalks.

Seven inmates escape from Leavenworth-Lansing prisons

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Five inmates armed with homemade knives overpowered and abducted a prison worker and a trusty, and escaped in a truck Tuesday from the U.S. Penitentiary in Leavenworth.

The breakout occurred about 4 p.m., roughly the same time two inmates were escaping from the Kansas State Penitentiary in nearby Lansing.

There was no initial indication that the two incidents were related.

All five of the federal escapees remained at large Tuesday night, after abandoning the truck and leaving the prison employee and trusty unharmed at Kansas City International Airport.

EACH of the escapees was serving lengthy sentences for bank robbery and should be considered dangerous, said Associate Warden Tom Keohane.

They were identified as Thomas Combs, 34, Hazel Park, Mich.; Roberto Ramirez, 50, Austin, Tex.; Terry Gallagher, 30, Dayton, Ohio; Leon Johnson, 38, Indianapolis, and Richard Alsop, 37, Lafayette, Ind.

The five began the escape by sneaking into the back of a truck that had entered the prison to pick up some trash, Keohane said. They hid behind a makeshift partition, then outside the prison overpowered the trusty, who was driving, and the prison employee. No shots were fired and no one was harmed.

The trusty was identified as James Villarreal, 42, and the prison worker as Nicholas Bilowick, 54.

THE INMATES drove the truck across the Missouri River to the Kansas City airport before abandoning it. Two of them are believed to have gotten off near Platte City and two more inside the airport itself.

Whereabouts of the fifth inmate remained unknown Tuesday night, said Keohane.

Police also reported the theft of a suitcase of clothes at the airport, leading to speculation that some of the inmates may have discarded their prison clothing.

Villarreal and Bilowick, who had been bound, were found in the truck after a passerby heard them shouting and banging on the truck.

Kansas State Penitentiary inmates took a truck at knifepoint Tuesday, crashed through two gates, ran a barricade and fled in a hail of gunfire from a tower guard.

One of the escapees was identified by Warden Kenneth Oliver as the convicted slayer of a Salina, Kan., policeman who should be considered "extremely dangerous."

The two reportedly fled to Tonganoxie, near Lansing, and tied up Mrs. J.M. Neiberger, wife of the publisher of the weekly Tonganoxie Mirror, then stole their 1977 Thunderbird.

The escapees were identified as Roy Schultz, 42, serving a term of 10 years to life for first-degree murder and aggravated robbery, and Larry Miller, 29, serving a term of one to 10 years for theft.

OLIVER said gunfire from the guard tower disabled the truck about 150 yards from the prison and the pair then stole a car at a nearby service station.

Renovation estimated at $400,000

Dorm destruction extensive

By VELINA HOUSTON
News Editor

"By failing to prepare, you prepare to fail," reads the graffiti on several walls in what was formerly the K-State Athletic Dormitory.

Judging from the conditions of the dorm, the Department of Athletics should have heeded that proverb in their maintenance of the dorm. In nine years of existence, it has deteriorated from a dream to a near-slum.

"Have you heard the expression 'the pits'?" said Thomas Frith, director of housing. "Well, that was doors and furniture) was totally unusable. We knew it would all have to be replaced."

Frith and Davenport estimated a total of $400,000 worth of renovations over a two-year period.

In one room, a set of keys lay lost in a corner and nearby was a tattered valentine that read, "What is a Sweetheart?" Christian literature was scattered among the debris, along with many "Beat K.U." stickers. Telephone numbers decorated the walls and one wall had a hole large enough for a person to pass into the next room. The dust was thick and the carpet ridden with stains.

"This is one of the nicer ones," Davenport said of the room.

"We haven't saved one piece of furniture and every door in this place has been mistreated," he said. "Some are completely missing. Wall veneers don't meet the fire code standards and, besides, some are so decayed, the whole walls had to be torn down."

DAVENPORT TOOK a jackknife and almost effortlessly uprooted the rotten wood by a shower stall. "The housekeeping at this dorm was just abominable," he said. "There are so many roaches, I don't know how we'll get rid of them all."

He said all valves, ceilings and floors have to be replaced on the showers because, as they are now, what that dorm was like before (renovation was begun)."

"It was a terrible place," said Lloyd Davenport, maintenance engineer for housing. "Bad enough to make an old man cry."

PRIOR TO renovation, the Athletic Department was in charge of running and maintaining the Athletic Dormitory. Now, re-christened as Edwards Hall, the dorm is under the jurisdiction and care of the housing department.

Housing maintenance is doing the repairs and rebuilding," Frith said. "Most of it (mattresses,

Hostels offer college life to elderly

By DEAN SPEIRS
Collegian Reporter

Advanced technology brings seeming miracles, but two of mankind's notable pursuits met with failure. Alchemists never changed lead into gold and a fountain of youth was never discovered.

Though dreams of creating gold faded, aging continues to bring problems such as low income, isolation, depression and physical deterioration to the elderly.

K-State may not be in search of a fountain of youth, but it has been involved in programs for the elderly. In an effort to combat aging problems, there is a possibility K-State might bring in and house the elderly on campus, as with any regular student.

Administrators, plagued with dropping enrollment figures at many universities, have found the elderly willing to participate in university life. One program in particular, Elder Hostels, has been successful in bringing the elderly to colleges.

"Maybe we can have an elder hostel program at K-State or Lawrence in the near future," said Nadine Burch, consultant to aging resources.

BURCH HOPED to visit an elder hostel program in New Hampshire this summer to make a recommendation to K-State on whether such a program should be pursued here.

Elder hostels have become popular and are growing in the eastern states, said Gail Kloosterman, New England coordinator for the program.

The New England region sets classroom and dormitory service standards for other regions which must be met in order for universities to use the name "Elder Hostel."

THE PROGRAM has spread to five other regions besides New Hampshire. All New England states are represented in the New Hampshire branch. The other regions are Ohio, Iowa, New York, North Carolina and Florida.

"We promote and regulate the use of university facilities for old people," Kloosterman said, "but our ultimate goal is to see active involvement by a large number of old people in a completely desegregated university environment. We want totally mixed universities."

"I think this would be very stifling," said Tim Shea, junior in art. "Everybody would be paranoid all the time. We'd have to be careful about things we do now that nobody cares about." Shea is a resident of Goodnow Hall.

CONCERNED or not about their sexual affairs, many young students are currently living in dormitories without segregation by age.

"At least two colleges, Eckerd in Cincinnati and Franconia in New Hampshire, are operating hostels with the young and old living together," Kloosterman said. "Their aim is to make hostel living a total campus experience."

Segregation may not be advisable from the point of view of the elderly, says an Administration on Aging study of the elderly in 15 states. The three-year study done by Powell Lawton "shows favorable effects of age segregation on the amount of participation in activities, amount of satisfaction with their housing and amount of interaction with their families" experienced by the elderly.

This finding could mean elder hostels would better suit the elderly if the generations were segregated.

IN MOST hostels the generations are not mixed, however.

"Most hostels are similar to the one at the University of New Hampshire," Kloosterman said. "Elderly people are given the first two floors of the dorm, because it is easier for them if they are on the bottom floors."

"We charge $60 a week for room and board. This charge also includes classes. Three courses are offered during the summer session and students can take as many as they like. Some are invited to return to school during the fall and spring terms, but the program is mostly oriented to summer activity."

OTHER universities with programs for the elderly differ in their approaches to housing problems.

The University of New Jersey had an older-persons program two years before elder hostels began.

New Jersey waives tuition fees and educational prerequisites for older people. The elderly are left to make their own arrangements for lodging, food, books, lab materials and transportation. Older students are encouraged to participate in campus activities, including using the campus library, the student center and the counseling center, according to Aging, an Administration on Aging publication.

Jamestown College in North Dakota makes its housing facilities available to the elderly. Its program, Educational Vacations, is offered at half price, however, to those who find housing off campus.

Ackers will host graduate reception

A reception for summer graduates will be hosted by President and Mrs. Duane Acker from 7:30 to 8:30 p.m. on July 28 in the Union Ballroom.

The reception is the first for summer graduates and is a pilot program for December graduates and future summer graduates. Presently, the only ceremony for graduates is the commencement exercise in May.

Invitations were mailed to all students expected to receive bachelor's or advanced degrees.

Faculty members and the public are also encouraged to attend, said Max Milbourn, assistant to the president.

Light refreshments will be served by students who have been or are involved in student government.

A receiving line with the Ackers and John Conard and Frank Lowman of the Board of Regents will form at the end of the reception.

"This is an informal affair," Milbourn said. "We are encouraging students to bring their families, neighbors and friends. The president wants to personalize the University-graduate relationship."

WASHINGTON—House Republican leaders, rebuffed by President Carter in their demand for a special prosecutor to conduct the Korean influence-buying probe, said Tuesday they will try to force a House vote on the matter.

At the same time, a group of junior Republicans called for creation of a new House panel to take over the investigation from Rep. John Flynt's Committee on Standards of Official Conduct. They suggested rehiring Philip Lacovara, the chief investigator who quit last Friday in a dispute with Flynt.

Flynt emerged from a meeting with Speaker Thomas O'Neill and other House leaders Tuesday and promised to give a written guarantee of "total independence" to whoever is chosen to replace Lacovara.

KANSAS CITY, Kan.—A federal judge late Tuesday afternoon ordered the arrest of magazine publisher Al Goldstein, after he refused to come to Kansas City for a physical to determine whether he is well enough to stand trial on obscenity charges.

Judge Frank Theis ordered Goldstein's $10,000 bond forfeited and instructed that a bench warrant be issued for his arrest. A spokesman for Goldstein said in New York that the defendant expected to be arrested at his New York apartment Wednesday morning.

WASHINGTON—Prime Minister Menachem Begin of Israel presented President Carter on Tuesday with a comprehensive Middle East peace plan that calls for broad Israeli withdrawals in Sinai and on the Golan Heights and establishment of a semiautonomous Arab civil administration on the west bank of the Jordan River, sources said.

Begin left the detailed proposal for Carter to consider after the leaders held their initial two-hour meeting at the White House.

The Israeli plan also suggested reconvening the Geneva conference in the fall with subcommittees set up to deal with the details of settlements on all three fronts, the sources said.

There is no place in the Begin plan for the Palestine Liberation Organization to be represented at the peace table.

ANCHORAGE—A truck ran into the trans-Alaska pipeline Tuesday evening, causing an oil leak that forced an immediate shutdown of the pipeline only 24 hours after it had been restarted.

Edward Patton, chief executive officer of Alyeska Pipeline Service Co., said the accident at 5:55 p.m. EDT knocked a small valve off the pipeline.

"This is not something that is going to keep us down more than a few hours," Patton said. It was the second shutdown of the line this month.

Patton said workmen already were fixing the leak, but did not know how much oil had leaked out at the site, 23 miles south of the northern terminus of the 800-mile pipeline at Prudhoe Bay.

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.—The United States predicted Tuesday that Vietnam would gain membership in the United Nations and said this would create an obligation for the Southeast Asian country "to advance human rights."

U.S. delegate Donald McHenry spoke as the Security Council debated a resolution recommending the Communist Vietnam for admission. Actual membership would be granted by vote of the forthcoming General Assembly session.

McHenry's allusion to the time "when the Socialist Republic of Vietnam will be admitted to membership in the United Nations next fall" was the first remark on public U.N. records confirming U.S. abandonment of the veto that for two years has blocked Vietnamese membership.

Fall student housing scarce; dorms full, apartments few

Editor's note: This is the second part of a two-part feature on fall housing problems at K-State.

By NANCY DENNING
Collegian Reporter

When fall semester begins, the housing situation for K-State students will be tighter than ever before. Dorms have been full for months and apartment complexes only have a few openings left.

There are other avenues for the student but with these there are also various problems.

A big problem facing students is Ft. Riley personnel renting apartment spaces.

"Wildcat Inn usually rents to Ft. Riley people in June and July because of the split season," said Robert Logan, owner. "A lot of students take out a year's lease and then sublet the apartment to Ft. Riley people in June and July."

"Royal Towers is owned by the Alumni Association so we rent to students first," said Jay Walker, assistant manager. "If there are openings then we will rent to military."

"This year is probably the first time there will be all students, because housing is so tight," Walker said.

OTHER AVENUES open to students are buying houses and mobile homes.

"Grunz Realty has several inquiries, but a small per cent actually buy homes," said Lisa Keller, salesperson. "The big trend is for students, especially young married students, to buy duplexes. They live in one side and rent the other side."

"Mobile homes are really the cheapest housing Manhattan has to offer students," said Linda Long, office manager of Woodward Mobile Homes.

"The biggest advantage to mobile homes is that the students can live in them while they're in school and then have something to re-sell after graduation," Long said.

THERE ARE further problems facing some K-State students. Two are marital status and discrimination.

"I think being married was an asset in finding an apartment," said Kim Washington, senior in journalism. "I did come across a few racial prejudices but it was too much effort on my part to turn them in."

There is a Student Discrimination Review Committee set-up at K-State to assist with problems.

"The committee is made up of three students, two faculty members and one administrator as chairperson. The board will have two women and two members of a racial or ethnic minority as defined by HEW guidelines," said Pat Green, assistant director of Affirmative Action.

"I was a member of the board last fall and we did not have any cases," said Terry Matlack, student body president. "To my knowledge there were no cases in the spring either."

"The main reason for the board is so that students can contact the chairperson and tell him he has been discriminated against on a university matter," Matlack said. "It would then be brought before the board. Of course, all of this must be done in writing."

"If there is indeed discrimination, legal actions can be taken," Matlack said.

"I just don't see how things could be as tight as they (university officials) say they are," said Marilyn Davenport, county enumerator. "The City's appraiser's office did a count in January and showed about 500 vacancies. The only place where vacancies were not found were right around the campus."

Davenport said this was the first time this count had been done.

"Students should get to campus early to find a place," said Tom Frith, director of housing. "Then there would be few, if any, problems."

State should fund academic buildings

The ever-increasing costs of a college education; the rise in tuition, the sky-rocketing price of textbooks, the cost of room and board, are now being added to by yet another cost. The cost of building new facilities.

The Washburn Recreation Complex, approved for construction by student referendum, will cost K-State students $3 million in extra fees. While considering voting on the referendum, students were not informed of the "hidden" charge; interest.

The interest on the $3 million loan will total $2.2 million. Most of the fees extracted from the students for the complex will go to paying off the interest and it will be many years in the future before the principal is even touched.

WHILE STUDENTS have often paid for buildings such as Unions and stadiums through student fees, it was not until 1970 that students were actually forced to share the burden of the construction of academic buildings.

Prior to 1970, the state was responsible for financing the construction of these types of buildings, either through funds extracted from the Educational Building Fund or through legislative appropriation.

Because of the student population explosion around 1970, the legislature backed down from its responsibilities and shifted the financial burden to the students.

Now, faced with declining enrollment, universities will have to dig further into the pockets of students to pay for new facilities.

It hardly seems fair. What was once a duty of the legislature is now pressing on students a greater and greater financial burden. It's time something is done to return the burden where it rightfully belongs; on the state.

English faces faltering fate

Language-wise, us Americans are in trouble.

If you don't believe me, read Edwin Newman's "Strictly Speaking" and "Civil Tongue", he does a better job than I could hope to in making users and abusers more aware of the sins perpetrated daily upon the English language. A Spring Collegian News Editor, Ben Wearing, tried to do the same thing.

But the problem remains; out of utter carelessness and faltering attempts to present a mastery of the language, we are slowly strangling American English.

Whether it's out of ignorance or arrogance, the language is becoming numb from misuse.

But it's not just using incorrect words, although that is certainly a big part of the problem. Newman recalls hearing a young lady declare that she would not allow herself to become an escape goat.

MUCH of the problem continues past word selection into grammar, adding a few letters to the end of a word to save using a few more words, speaking without saying anything and using words which are unnecessarily long and cumbersome in place of a more concise selection.

And then there are the euphemisms designed to bolster an ego or make a situation seem more desirable. Wearing cited the example of slaughtering here at K-State. A reporter was told that those in the meat department do not slaughter the animals, they humanely immobilize them.

I suggest we are inhumanely immobilizing our language.

There are buzz words which are used daily, mostly by technicians or specialists in some field. These blemishes on the language include the inputs, the outputs, the factors, the contingencies, the viable alternatives and the facilitations. Such words, especially viable, are almost without meaning and are so vague and useless that they degrade their user.

Newman writes of an investment company saying, "We have exceptional game plan capabilities together with strict concerns for programming successful situations."

It doesn't take an intellectual giant to fish through a dictionary or thesaurus for dime words. But putting any words together in such a way so they don't hinder communication seems to be quite another story.

This gem came from Henry Knoche's statements as he resigned as the Deputy Director of Central Intelligence: "But in the end, having weighed all the factors, I concluded that it would be in the best interests of the agency (CIA) and the nation's intelligence efforts if I stepped aside now to facilitate the director's task as he prepares to make decisions about new organizational forms and the kind of leadership that he will need to carry out his future plans."

It's a good thing Knoche weighed all the factors, but I wonder if the Director ever considered carrying out past plans instead of future ones. He might have said he is quitting to make the Director's job easier.

WE NO longer take the shortest verbal route between two points. We have to distort what we're saying by tossing in words intended to send the listener or reader scrambling for a dictionary.

By sticking an "ize" at the end of a word we magically change it into a verb, and while it may make the user sound more knowledgeable, it usually comes out wrong.

And then there's "wise", which is commonly tacked onto the tail end of a noun to save a word or two. At the risk of being a wise guy, it's incorrect, language-wise and grammar-wise, to try to verbalize in such a way which semi-economizes words, English-wise, that is.

The only remedy for this plague seems to be, drastic as this sounds, giving some thought to what one says before speaking. If we'd all think about what we say before saying it, we'd be able to better eternalize our language and communicate good.

Letter to the editor

'Documentary' not a true portrayal

Editor,

On July 12, a film was shown in the Union Little Theater at 8:00 p.m. The advertisements for the film, sponsored by UPC, were seriously misleading with regard to the film content, being that of the funeral of Mao Tse-Tung rather than that of his acts of glory as a leader as was implied in the advertisements. They were essentially an obvious political message from the Liaison Office of Communist China in N.Y. but fully financed by UPC. The ad not only falls short of the objectives of UPC, since the printed matter is extremely controversial and can hardly be viewed as a statement of historical evidence but also damages the credibility of UPC.

THE FILM itself, lasting an unnecessary two hours and as implied before, with its coverage virtually limited to the funeral of Mao, makes it necessary to conclude that it is merely a piece of political propaganda utilizing the obsolete techniques employed yet by the Red Chinese. It can't be denied that the scenes shot in the People's Memorial Hall in Peking may be as represented. But the tears appearing on the thousands of Chinese faces don't in any way indicate their respect for Mao but rather reflects the strength of control exerted by the ruling class over them and that 28 years of education under Chinese Communism has successfully brainwashed these people. However, the scenes of mourning for the late Chairman on ships, trains, country sides, factories and etc., were obviously performed for the sole purpose of the movie being filmed. These scenes, thus, cannot be considered documentary at all as was announced in the Collegian. The lesson learned many times from very recent Chinese history to never fully trust the communist, unfortunately, becomes self-evident once again.

FINALLY, in the wake of the human rights issue pursued by President Carter, and the enthusiastic effort of his administration in normalizing relations with the Red Chinese, it would appear necessary to remind those people who are willing to be utilized merely as broadcasting machines of Peking that the recognition of Communist China by the U.S. government does not mean that their merciless and widespread destruction of Chinese culture and people has been undone. At the same time, the Chinese should be strongly encouraged to continue to pursue a strong, democratic and free China, regardless of the outlook on horizon, since human rights, supposedly an apolitical, humanitarian issue, but no more than another empty superpower slogan at present time, can only be truly understood by the people who have suffered and won it.

water pours into the rooms below. The stalls are rotted, many beyond repair.

Some rooms are painted coal black. The problem with that, Davenport said, is the athletes used a glossy enamel which is hard to paint over and causes the new coat to peel.

"Isn't that depressing," he said as he pointed to a room with shiny black walls and chartreuse stripes. "No wonder they can't play ball."

All the carpet has to be removed because it is rotten and mildewed from being flooded from the bathrooms, he said.

THE ONLY light fixtures in the rooms originally were bullet lights which, according to Davenport, are both visually inadequate and easy to short-circuit. New fluorescent, overhead lights are being installed.

Frith said rooms need to be stripped and re-painted, doors replaced, floors refinished and heating and cooling systems repaired extensively.

"The Athletic Department had their own maintenance personnel before we took over who were supposed to keep this place up," Davenport said. "The condition it is in is unbelievable. The dorm has never been completely overhauled in its nine years."

"It was abounding in cockroaches before we stepped in," Frith said. "We have fumigated and refumigated to get rid of them." An independent firm is also installing new roofing throughout the dorm.

Frith said Edwards Hall will not be done completely by fall, but it will be ready for residents to move in.

"We will do $200,000 of work this year and work through the winter and next fall when an additional $200,000 will be spent," Davenport said.

Center emphasizes cross-cultural sharing

By LAURIE LYNCH
Collegian Reporter

The Minorities Resource and Research Center is available for use by interested persons in obtaining special resources relating to Blacks, Chicanos and Native Americans.

Antonia Quintana Pigno, director, said the center is not only for the minority student to find out about himself, but also for others to find out about the minorities.

It is a "cross-cultural sharing kind of thing," Pigno said.

The Center functions as an academic institution for students and not as a social organizer.

"We do no social sponsoring," she said.

LAST SPRING, Helen Hardin, American Indian artist, was asked by the Center to display her works. Pigno said the Center will be getting away from asking people to come. The focus of the Center in the past, Pigno said, has been to publicize the Center. Now, the focus has shifted to "carefully collecting and organizing the materials available."

During the summer, the use of the Center is proportionate to the number of students attending summer school.

"We have a few students using the Center," she said.

The Center, started in 1971, is located on the fourth floor of Farrell Library. It was financed through a grant of $12,000 from the Student Governing Association (SGA). In 1973, K-State assumed financial responsibility of the Center.

The Center is staffed by a director, part-time clerk-typist and student help. There is an Advisory Board which meets with the director to discuss planning, programming and general administration.

Nationals win All-Star game; beat American League, 7-5

NEW YORK (AP)—Joe Morgan smashed a leadoff home run, touching off a display of power that carried the National League to a 7-5 victory over the American League in the 48th annual baseball All-Star Game Tuesday night.

Greg Luzinski and Steve Garvey also homered for the Nationals, who won their sixth straight game and 14th in the last of 15 of these midsummer confrontations.

The AL now trails in the series 29-18—there was one tie.

When the Americans threatened in the late innings, Dave Winfield singled in a pair of eighth-inning runs that put the NL back in control.

Boston's George Scott boomed a long two-run homer to right centerfield in the bottom of the ninth, pulling the AL within two runs, but that was as close as they got.

Don Sutton of the Los Angeles Dodgers blanked the AL on just one hit over the first three innings and watched the long ball power of his National League teammates construct an early 5-0 lead off Baltimore's Jim Palmer.

Morgan, the Cincinnati second baseman led off the the NL, and Palmer, the AL starting pitcher, worked carefully to him.

Workshop examines health issues

Editor's note: This is the second of a two-part story on the Kansas Women's Weekend held last weekend in Wichita.

By BARBARA RUST
Collegian Reporter

Most workshops at Kansas Women's Weekend were interrupted by anti-ERA and pro-family forces, but the Health Issues workshop was an exception.

Evalyn Gendel, associate director of the Bureau of Maternal and Child Health, led this seminar and made a conscious effort to run the meeting according to schedule.

The priority resolution brought from this workshop to the general session was teenage pregnancy. This resolution requested information, education and services be available in Kansas schools and communities regarding sexual responsibility and family planning to teenage students. It passed with a majority. The workshop also endorsed abortions, but this wasn't brought to the general session.

A WOMAN expects her doctor to think of her as a whole person and provide good health care, according to Audrey Switzer, health educator for the State Department of Health and Environment. This is especially true when she visits her gynecologist.

One way to improve the patient-doctor relationship is to establish interest in the doctor as a person.

"Say to your physician sometime, 'I know you're interested in medicine and my well-being. Could I arrange to see my own exam,'" Gendel said.

This request tells the doctor the woman is interested in him and lets the woman know the procedure. The doctor could explain what he is doing as he does it, she said. This reassures the patient and puts her at ease.

When calling a doctor for the first time and the receptionist says no appointments are available for four months, ask to speak to the doctor, Gendel said.

"You need to speak to the person who is delivering the service," she said.

According to Marni Vliet, member of Wichita's Commission on Status of Women, the prospective patient might interview the doctor on the phone or in person. To find a doctor with similar ideas, she could ask him value questions on issues including confidentiality, abortion, house calls and birth control.

"The best way to find a doctor is through peers," Gendel said.

"You could also pick one out of the phone book, call the local medical society for a recommendation or visit the local health department."

"Your health is your own," she said. "To deal with it, get as much background information as you can. Learn some medical jargon. Read columns in Redbook, for instance."

Health educators try to get women involved in their own health care, Vliet said. This includes breast self examinations and annual Pap smears. Over 90 per cent of the women who had breast surgery last year discovered problems themselves.

"Only a little more than 50 per cent of women get regular Pap smears," she said. "This is because women don't get insurance for Pap smears."

A large medical problem is overprescription of drugs, but to some extent, it's not the doctor's fault, Vliet said. Patients expect the doctor to prescribe a drug each time they go visit him. To them this indicates the doctor is taking care of her.

Drugs often give side effects and patients don't realize this. For example, if one drug makes the patient sleepy, she shouldn't take it before a long driving trip.

"Find out what the side effects of the drug are," Vliet said. "Find alternative treatment. The more confident women are with jargon, the more they will be in asking questions."

Another health problem affecting women is alcoholism, said

Pam Banta, associate director of the Kansas chapter of National Council on Alcoholism, and an admitted alcoholic.

The woman alcoholic has lower self-esteem than the male alcoholic. Women usually begin drinking at a life cycle crisis and this is often related to her image as a woman, she said.

"A woman alcoholic has a conflict on feminine versus masculine traits," Banta said.

"She is often a hidden drinker because she is protected by the people around her—husband, family and doctors."

Although half the five million alcoholics in the United States are women, one out of four get treatment, said Mary Ellen Chamberlain, executive director of the Kansas chapter of National Council on Alcoholism and an admitted alcoholic. The woman has lower recovery rate than the male alcoholic.

Citizens will participate in city planning program

By CHRIS WILLIAMS
City Editor

The City of Manhattan has instituted a program which leaders hope will make the city a more attractive and safe place to live.

Called the Citizen Participation Program, the members of the city commission, planning department and involved citizens are designing a master plan which will concern itself with the beautification of the city and the alleviation of problems facing Manhattan citizens.

The project's outline calls for the planning department to conduct the meetings. Citizens chosen to attend the organization meetings may also participate as chairmen at the general public meetings. Club presidents from organizations such as the Rotary, Lions, Veterans of Foreign Wars and the League of Women Voters are encouraged to elicit their support to both the planning staff and the organizing citizens.

Mayor Russell Reitz issued a plea for more citizen involvement and invited all persons to become concerned with the project.

"The City Commission has always felt that citizen involvement is an important part of local government," Reitz said. "Participation in the planning effort will be very helpful as we try to deal with the future of Manhattan."

REITZ SAID THE planning staff would meet with any organization to present a slide show and lecture outlining the plans for the city.

Planner Barbara Bloomberg said the group has divided the improvements into city and Aggieville categories.

Bloomberg said at the July 5 meeting with the Aggieville Businessmen Association the group recommended part improvements, better grainage systems, public transportation and better trash removal systems for the city.

The group also recommended for Aggieville more trash cans, better lighting, better traffic control, sidewalk beautification and a variation of businesses in the area.

The group found recreation and friendly marchants as a favorable aspect of the city, as well as the healthy economy, the Chamber of Commerce, health facilities and housing.

Bloomberg said the group is meeting with organizations such as the Lions and Rotary until September when they will begin meeting with neighborhood groups at schools and the Douglas Center.

Scheduled meetings include conferences with the Older Manhattan Neighborhood Association, the Home Builders Association, the Lions Club and the Arts Council.

Career women face 'hairy' predicament

LONDON (AP)—Young career women increasingly are falling victim to "stress disease" and developing facial and chest hair, baldness, and a higher sex drive, a British medical professor claims.

Dr. Ivor Mills of Addenbrooke's Hospital, Cambridge, has been researching hormonal changes in working women since 1963, seeing up to 40 women each week at his clinic. He disclosed some of his findings in the latest edition of the weekly magazine "Women's Own."

Mills urged working females, especially married women in their 20s, "to recognize their limits before it's too late." He said the so-called stress disease is widespread among women and becoming more prevalent all the time.

"I think this is because young women take on more responsibilities and they get married earlier when their personalities have not matured," he said.

"When the brain's control of the hormone is disturbed a woman often grows excess hair. It can be very distressing."

Do it in the dirt! Trials of moto-cross

Moto-cross is the second most grueling sport in the world next to soccer, but many people don't even know what it is.

A form of motorcycle racing, moto-cross participants compete on a closed track over natural terrain full of hills, jumps, ruts and sharp turns. The non-professional racer runs two heats, or "motos," which usually last 15 minutes for juniors and 20 minutes for experts.

The race begins after a cycle line-up and the drop of the gate—then it's a mad dash to get the "whole shot," or the lead, going into the first turn. A flagman indicates the final lap.

THE MOST RECENT state race was Sunday at the Knobby Hills track in Olsburg. Sponsored by a local motorcycle retailer, the race was a "classic," making it worth five times the normal points usually awarded.

Most Kansas moto-cross are for trophies and points rather than money. Points are awarded according to each place a rider finishes. At the end of the year the rider with the most points is declared the winner in his division.

For "point chasers" moto-cross can mean a dusty, hot, expensive and sometimes dangerous summer. What makes so many load up their vans and trucks week after week and travel the state to ride moto-cross?

"I guess I ride just for the satisfaction of doing well," said Randy Johnson of Concordia, current state leader in one expert class.

JOHNSON estimated his expenses are $30 a week, not including the initial investment in protective clothing.

Most riders wear leather pants, leather boots with steel toes, shoulder pads, kidney guards and leather gloves which cost from $300 to $400.

"It's an expensive hobby," said Mike Wisdom, owner of a local cycle shop. "It takes someone who holds a lot of store in self-satisfaction."

According to Johnson, injuries in moto-cross aren't uncommon but also aren't the rule. They usually are the result of rider error, but track conditions can pose problems, he said.

THERE WAS one accident at the Knobby Hills Classic which resulted in a broken collar bone for one rider.

A medic is usually on hand at all Kansas Motorcycle Sportsman Association events, and sometimes an ambulance is also present.

"I think these people are all crazy, myself," said Tom Weltsch, the medic on duty at Knobby Hills. "I can't understand why they ride."

Mrs. Elton Darrah, Manhattan, said both her sons race and she couldn't miss watching them.

"When they break their collar bone someone has to be there to take them to the hospital," she said. "At times it's nerve-racking, but I'm their biggest fan."

Last summer the Darrahs traveled across the state and didn't miss a weekend of moto-cross.

It may seem a bit fanatical to some, but such moto-cross enthusiasm was summed up by one fan, who amidst the choking dust and fumes of the race was heard to say, "I love it, I love it."

Jaworski to direct Korean probe

WASHINGTON (AP)—Former special Watergate prosecutor Leon Jaworski, who obtained the tape that forced former President Richard Nixon to resign, agreed Wednesday to become chief investigator of the House probe into alleged Korean influence-buying in Congress.

Jaworski agreed in a telephone call to Rep. John Flynt, D-Ga., chairman of the House committee conducting the investigation. He will replace Philip Lacovara, who quit Friday in a fight with Flynt.

Reporters witnessing the phone call in Washington could hear only Flynt's words. At one point he assured Jaworski, "That's perfectly agreeable to me. As a matter of fact, I'm a very easy person to get along with."

FLYNT SAID Jaworski insisted on taking the job without pay. Flynt said this "came as a complete surprise to me."

Lacovara and his law firm were being paid $75 per man-hour for time spent on the case.

Lacovara worked under Jaworski on the Watergate case. He and Jaworski argued the Nixon tapes case before the Supreme Court, which ruled unanimously in July 1974 that Nixon had to surrender them to the prosecutor.

Flynt said he expects the committee to approve Jaworski as the new special counsel for the investigation at a meeting Thursday. He said Jaworski plans to begin working full time Aug. 15.

THE CHAIRMAN said he sent Jaworski five pounds of documents Tuesday night and said Jaworski would not have accepted the job without them.

He refused to say what the documents were but said they were not committee evidence.

One of Jaworski's law partners, Peter White, will serve as special deputy counsel beginning as early as Thursday, Flynt said, and Jaworski will probably be involved in the probe before he takes over full-time in mid-August.

Asked if Jaworski's law firm, which has a Washington office, might have any clients that would subject him to conflict of interest in the investigation, Flynt called the question insulting and said he had already satisfied himself that neither Jaworski nor the law firm has any conflict of interest.

JAWORSKI was special Watergate prosecutor from November 1973 to October 1974, and during that time obtained the so-called "smoking gun" tape that forced former President Nixon to resign Aug. 9, 1974.

House Speaker Thomas O'Neill earlier said he had "high hopes" that Jaworski would take over the investigation of the allegations that South Korean agents bribed members of Congress.

O'Neill and House Majority Leader Jim Wright also had telephoned Jaworski to urge him to take the post.

The speaker said he promised the Houston attorney that he would have the same authority he had as special Watergate prosecutor: "complete freedom to do a complete and thorough job no matter who it touches."

Begin favors new Geneva peace talks

WASHINGTON (AP)—Prime Minister Menachem Begin of Israel said Wednesday he has proposed to President Carter that "mixed commissions" be set up at a reconvened Middle East peace conference this fall to negotiate peace treaties and permanent boundaries with Egypt, Syria and Jordan.

At a news conference after his final meeting with Carter, Begin flatly ruled out any role for the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) or any of its members at the conference in Geneva.

"Their design bluntly and simply, is to destroy our country and to destroy our people," Begin said.

HE SAID his government would set no preconditions, and if the Arab states are unable to go to Geneva without the PLO Israel would be prepared to meet with them on neutral grounds or conduct negotiations through "the good offices of the United States."

Carter said after his third and final meeting with Begin that the Geneva conference "very likely" will reconvene in October despite the differences between the Arab states and Israel.

Carter said he would send Secretary of State Cyrus Vance to the Middle East on Aug. 1, but it was "difficult to predict" the chances for a settlement.

Begin, at his news conference, declined to outline the territorial concessions Israel might be prepared to make in exchange for peace treaties.

HOWEVER, one of his principal strategists, Foreign Minister Moshe Dayan, has said Israel has expressed willingness to make broad withdrawals in Sinai and on the Golan Heights while a semi-autonomous civil Arab administration could be set up on the West Bank of the Jordan River. Informed sources who provided details of the peace formula to The Associated Press last night said that the new government remained committed to such an approach provided the Arab states signed peace treaties and the withdrawals under strict security safeguards.

BEGIN AND Carter appeared to hit it off during their five hours of talks. But on the issues involved, Carter said, "There are strong differences of opinion between Israel and the Arabs and it is best to be reticent."

Begin said flatly that no member of the PLO could be seated at Geneva under any circumstances.

The last session was held in October 1973 following the most recent Middle East war.

In Beirut, a PLO spokesman said Begin's plan was "a war plan, not a peace plan," and said the Carter administration and the American people should not be deceived by it.

Rainsberger eyes offense; plans to take Cats to top

By SHEREE LOWE
Collegian Reporter

Ellis Rainsberger's first two seasons as head football coach at K-State could be likened to the job of a bricklayer. Starting at the foundation, he is continuing to work his way up and has not lost his desire to reach the top.

After two seasons and four victories, Rainsberger said he believes K-State has progressed to a prosperous point.

Besides trying to win each game, Rainsberger and his team have attempted to keep victories and the building of their foundation in perspective.

"We are aiming for the top and the days of us taking anything from anybody are over at K-State. We plan to be highly competitive from here on out," Rainsberger said.

SPECULATING on the upcoming football season, both the non-conference and the Big Eight conference games will be as strong, if not stronger than they were last year, Rainsberger said.

The K-State Wildcats will begin the season with a different strength than spectators are used to. The defense will be the weaker point of the team.

"Our defense lost eight starters due to graduation, with all the offensive starters returning," Rainsberger said.

"Down defensive linemen, defensive tackles and punters are what we are lacking. The young defense will have to take these places and play with intensity and enthusiasm."

Rainsberger doesn't believe instilling enthusiasm in the players will be any problem.

"The key to enthusiasm involves the chemistry of the players, hope for the future and a coach that can be the catalyst in putting the whole thing together," Rainsberger said.

THIS FALL the football players will be moving into a new living situation as the athletic dorm has been taken over by the University and renamed Edwards Hall.

"I think this is great. It will be an adjustment for the players, but one that I don't anticipate will take much time to get used to," Rainsberger said.

"A lot of credit goes to President Acker, Chet Peters and Dan Beatty for coordinating this effort in taking over the athletic dorm and providing an environment of cleanliness that will be conducive to good morale within the athletes," he said.

The Wildcats report back for duty Aug. 18 and begin a three week pre-season practice session.

"This is one of the shortest pre-season practice dates that we've ever had. But all of our competition is up against this same fight for time and in three weeks we'll be ready for action," Rainsberger said.

Program helps children, volunteers

By DEAN SPEIRS
Collegian Reporter

Big Brothers-Big Sisters (BBBS) local director Dick Smith works well over 50 hours a week for the organization without financial compensation.

In the last year and a half, BBBS in Manhattan has grown under Smith's direction from a small group serving only 25 youngsters to a large organization with well over 200 children referred for assistance.

"If I could see one change in the Big Brothers program," said Joe Campbell, a big brother, "I would like to see Dick Smith get paid for his efforts, particularly since he has cut back to 55 hours a week now."

The Big Brothers program, organized in Manhattan in 1965, merged four years ago with Manhattan Big Sisters, which was formed in 1972.

BIG BROTHERS began in 1903 when a Cincinnati businessman,

The Collegian yesterday incorrectly reported that Commissioner Robert Linder voted against the proposal to allow for three new parking lots in Aggieville.

Linder voted to allow for construction of the lots.

Also, a flier released to the University recently announcing the closing of Ahearn facilities for remodeling purposes listed Raydon Robel as director.

In clarification of the news stories derived from that flier, Raydon Robel is director of Recreational Services and Dave O'Brien is director of the Ahearn Complex.

Irvin Westheimer, found a young boy digging for food in a back-alley trash can. Westheimer talked to the boy and found he had no father.

Concerned the boy and others like him needed sound guidance, Westheimer decided such boys could benefit from an association with interested men who could act as big brothers to them.

A year later in New York City, Ernest Coulter discovered from children's court records that deviant children often came from homes where the father was absent.

Through his church, Coulter formed an organization to establish one-to-one relationships with children from broken homes.

TODAY Big Brothers has over 300 agencies throughout the U.S. Big Sisters has over 100 agencies. Together they serve more than 100,000 children and their families.

Big Brothers members in Manhattan represent all ages, races and religions.

"A special effort has been made to recruit minorities," Smith said, "but to date this effort has not met with much success in the Manhattan area."

BBBS members include professional people, students and laborers, Smith said.

"We're also interested in retired or senior citizens," he said.

SMITH joined BBBS three years ago when he was driving a school bus and working with Head Start.

"My association with children through these two activities brought to light the need for adult companionship and guidance in the lives of many of these children," Smith said.

"I hear a lot of children screaming for attention," he said. "Getting into trouble is a way for them to attract attention to themselves."

"There is an alternative to trouble, however. Healthy, sound relationships will allow the child to feel that he is an important and special person."

"Big Brothers-Big Sisters is a preventive measure for crime. People complain that the world is a bad place to live. We're doing something about it."

BBBS in Manhattan is presently serving St. George, Riley, Ogden and rural Manhattan in addition to the city itself.

"We desperately need volunteers," Smith said. "We could match up a hundred more children if we had big brother volunteers available."

"We encourage single parents with children who are withdrawn, unhappy, achieving below their abilities in school, lying, taking drugs or displaying other forms of destructive behavior to contact us for help," he said.

Brian Hardy, Smith's little brother in the program, said he's going to be a big brother when he's older.

"I think having been a little brother will help me to be a good big brother," he said.

"I probably wouldn't get to do a lot of things if it wasn't for him," he said. "He's pretty good. He tries to keep me out of all sorts of trouble."

ANITA SCOTT, big sister, finds time is not a serious problem even for those with tight schedules.

"If you want to spend time with a little sister or brother, they begin to come first on your list of things to do. It's when you plan to do something and end up unable to do it that really hurts them."

Scott planned an activity and then was unable to participate because she had to work.

"When I explained to her, she said 'That's okay, it happens to me all the time,'" Scott said.

Scott said her little sister has a negative outlook on life and this is one of the things she is trying to help her overcome.

CAMPBELL is trying to give his little brother some concrete objectives for his life.

"He didn't think he needed an education. He'd get booted out of school for two or three days at a time, and he'd be proud of it."

Campbell's little brother is currently in the Juvenile Youth Center in Emporia for breaking his probation agreements. He left town with his mother after his parents split up. When he returns, he will continue to go to school, Campbell hopes.

"It's tough to get him to open up," Campbell said. "He has no real opinions about things." Social and Rehabilitation Service workers have talked to Campbell and they are giving him ideas about how to encourage his little brother.

Barbara Reagan, big sister, said she also found the program rewarding.

"I used to smoke," she said. Her little sister told her she couldn't wait to get older so she could start smoking too.

"I quit smoking and told her it meant a lot to me that she not smoke. She was impressed that I was serious about it. I told her I would give her $20 when she turns 18 if she doesn't smoke."

"There is something in it for the adult," she said. "I quit a dirty, filthy habit."

"The least thing you say when you disapprove of something hits them hard," she said. "They can be screamed at and yelled at by their mother and it goes in one ear and out the other. But if I say something about misbehavior even in a quiet tone, it is really taken seriously."

The great heat wave which kept the eastern two-thirds of the nation stifling for eight days began to break Wednesday as cooler weather pushed into the upper Midwest from Canada and headed east.

But most of the South, East and Midwest continued to suffer—especially in Pennsylvania, where thunderstorms flooded the area around Johnstown overnight and then moved out leaving temperatures still in the 90s.

The National Weather Service said the cooler, drier air from Canada had penetrated the upper Mississippi Valley into Nebraska by Wednesday and, at the rate it was moving, it could reach the mid-Atlantic states by tonight.

JOHNSTOWN, Pa.—A new Johnstown flood, triggered by an eight-hour rainfall, isolated 41,000 residents Wednesday and left death, destruction and muddy debris in its wake.

Roads washed away, communication lines fell, and at least 13 people were known dead as flood waters began to recede Wednesday afternoon.

Johnstown remained virtually isolated, and state police said 10 of the known dead were from outlying areas where the storm and flooding were less severe. Four died in the Westmoreland County town of Seward, where 35 mobile homes slid into the Conemaugh River as flood water gushed over the river banks.

Johnstown Mayor Herbert Pfuhl said earlier that three persons were dead and five were missing in his city.

WASHINGTON—The Federal Trade Commission said Wednesday that cigarette packages should flatly warn that smoking may kill you rather than saying it is merely dangerous to your health.

It also recommended that the tar and nicotine content of cigarettes appear on all packages and in all advertising.

The commission asked Congress to consider two stronger statements than that currently on packages:

"Warning: Cigarette Smoking is Dangerous to Health, and May Cause Death from Cancer, Coronary Heart Disease, Chronic Bronchitis, Pulmonary Emphysema and Other Diseases."

Or, "Warning: Cigarette Smoking is a Major Health Hazard and May Result in Your Death."

WASHINGTON—The House ad hoc energy committee voted last night to recommend that the House adopt an increase of four cents a gallon in the federal gasoline tax.

If the House concurs in the committee recommendation, the four-cent hike would be earmarked for a new federal energy trust fund which would be spent on federal mass transit programs, state transportation aid, and federal energy research and development programs.

The tax, together with other tentative provisions in the national energy plan before the House, would add some nine cents to the price of each gallon of gas.

MINNEAPOLIS—Blue jeans, the work pants of gold miners and cowboys that have become a worldwide fashion, are coming down in price this summer as stores across the nation mark them down to spur sales.

It all started at County Seat, a 175-store specialty chain headquartered near Minneapolis. They started the price-cutting trend last month by selling men's denim and corduroy Levi's, the nation's top selling jeans, for $12.50 a pair, marked down from about $15.50.

Wrangler brand jeans, another big seller, also have been marked down in some stores to meet the Levi's price.

K-State energy plan to be presented

By SHEREE LOWE
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas Energy Conservation Plan will be presented to consumers during the last quarter of 1977.

This plan was developed by the dean, faculty and graduate students of the engineering department at K-State.

K-State and the University of Kansas both submitted a proposal to the Kansas Energy Administration at the suggestion of the Kansas Energy Office.

K-STATE was selected to complete the six month project and their objective was to develop an energy conservation program in Kansas consisting of several measures to reduce consumer energy consumption.

Each state had the option to devise an energy plan. They were allotted $60,000 by the government for this project.

The guidelines set by the Federal Energy Administration for the proposals were to reduce standards for illumination, induce procurement of materials and products bought by the government (to base machinery on the highest energy efficient rate), mandate thermal efficiency standards (better insulation and heating), promote car pools and public transportation and permit vehicles to turn right on red lights, which has recently been allowed.

With these guidelines the researchers were to devise a way to obtain a five per cent savings on the projected 1980 energy consumption level.

THE RESEARCHERS found this impossible using the guidelines, so they looked at the problem from the standpoint of consumer sectors.

They divided the sectors into these categories: residential, commercial, utilities, industrial, agricultural, government operations and alternate energy sources (conservation of fossil fuels and recycling).

Two measures recommended in the plan are a regulation increase on low gas mileage cars and a stricter surveillance of the 55 mph speed limit.

The researchers said they believe by 1980 there will be a far greater savings than five per cent because of supply and demand of products and the pricing effects on consumers.

IN THE REPORT the engineers looked at projections by fuel types in relation to the trend of lives of consumer sectors from now to the year 2000 in five year segments.

The researchers concluded if present trends of availability and demand continue, there will be about 20 per cent less energy used in 1980, compared with the time series projections of the Kansas Energy Administration.

The plan will be implemented by the Kansas Energy Office with a proposed budget of $280,000. The program will be based on voluntary consumer action through education on energy conservation.

Home gardeners tour Ag experiment station

By STEVE CARTER
Collegian Reporter

Home gardeners received timely and helpful information last Tuesday and Wednesday nights at the Fruit and Vegetable Research Garden Tour sponsored by K-State's Agricultural Experiment Station and Extension Service.

The tour, an annual event at K-State's Ashland Horticulture Farm, used to be oriented around commercial interests until three years ago.

"We changed the tour to evening sessions about three years ago to get the backyard gardeners to come out," said Charles Marr, assistant professor of horticulture and forestry.

"The tour allows people to see ongoing research programs, allows us to teach and educate people on the practices available, and helps us get feedback from people on what information they need," Marr said.

THE TOUR had seven stops dealing with vegetables, vegetable culture, dry beans, small fruits, tree fruits, pesticide applications and canning and freezing of home fruits and vegetables. Research and extension staff from K-State were located at each stop to speak on each subject.

"We make one or two key points and directed them towards where they could get more information," Marr said.

There were also pamphlets available which gave more information on the practices of home gardening.

ANOTHER stop was the Pest Problem Clinic. People brought their sick plants and had pest control specialists from K-State diagnose what was wrong.

The tour has been a big success in recent years.

"We get people from Topeka, Wichita and a majority of Kansas," Marr said.

County agents in each county in Kansas can also answer questions and provide information throughout the year.

Open-door policy extends to Vietnam

After three vetoes of Vietnam applications to the United Nations, the United States is finally consenting to Vietnam admission and is even looking forward to working with that country in the future.

Vietnam, denied admission twice as separate applications and a third time as a newly-unified country, has had trouble accounting for Americans missing in action and has been looking unsuccessfully for American recompensory payments after the war.

Much of that has changed. The Vietnamese have shown a will to account for the almost 2,000 missing Americans, and they now realize American money isn't coming.

Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger said Tuesday that former President Richard Nixon did guarantee money during the Paris peace talks. He also said the Vietnamese apparently didn't understand that such money had to be approved by Congress.

They now know, and have accepted the fact that Nixon promised them something he shouldn't have.

A further U.S. objection to Vietnam admission was in the area of human rights. The United States realizes that vetoing admission to the U.N. probably won't force the Vietnamese to improve their human rights posture.

Instead, by admitting the country to the U.N., the Vietnamese would be obligated by advance human rights. That's a far better attitude than using the veto to try to force a country to change without providing an incentive.

The move to admit the Republic of Vietnam is a positive step in the effort to bring about peace and international cooperation.

While it is still important to account for every American lost in Vietnam, it is a relief to know the United States will no longer use its powerful veto to block the admission of Vietnam to the U.N.

Perhaps now that country can play a more active role in international affairs and begin in earnest to forget the tragedy which tore it apart for more than 30 years.

Please leave me alone

A few years ago, Helen Reddy had a hit song called "Leave me Alone." It shouldn't come as a surprise that people want a chance to be by themselves. Everyone has experienced a time when she would like to chuck whatever she is doing and shout "Leave me alone!"

The usual response to that remark is to have some goody two-shoes, like Mother Tums come comfort you and say, "There, there, that's all right. Everything is ok."

Everything is not ok if you let someone console you with such a remark. If you want to be left alone, let people know. Tell them there are times you don't want them around no matter how much you like them.

It isn't unusual for a young mother to be at her wits end while taking care of her children day in and day out. If someone should offer to take care of the kids for an afternoon, you can be sure she will accept.

Why? It has nothing to do with not liking to be with her children, it's just that too much of anything or anyone can cause disharmony.

This is also true for a student who lives in a dorm, sorority or fraternity. In these environments, you are thrust together with people day after day after day. After a while, the slightest thing can become annoying and you are soon designated a grouch.

There are many ways you can be by yourself. Take a walk and enjoy the scenery. Notice the birds building a nest or sit and listen to life pass you by. Take a drive along a nice country road. Go to a lake or favorite picnic place and contemplate your navel. Or the world's state of affairs.

Give yourself a chance to be by yourself. Do something just for yourself sometime and see what satisfaction can be obtained. Read a book you've never finished, treat yourself to an evening out by yourself—dinner and a show. Try out a new hairstyle or visit an out-of-the-way shop.

The idea is to be by yourself. Collect your thoughts. Release your frustrations on the wind. Prepare yourself to face the "real" world head on and figure out where you're going.

A chance to be alone can make a world of difference on your outlook on life and will help you cope with everyday problems, or aid the growth of a personal relationship.

A chance to be alone and get away from life can be one of the best ways to cope with life. So next time you want to shout "Leave me alone!", get out by yourself and enjoy.

Letters to the editor

Sisterhood visible during weekend

Editor,

I was greatly disturbed by the article, "Gong Show Revisited," in the July 19 Collegian. I also attended the Kansas Women's Weekend. Every incident mentioned was from the later evening sessions, when people were exhausted, and tempers were admittedly beginning to wear thin. However, it is unfair to characterize all of the weekend in this way.

I arrived at the conference late Friday evening, too late to attend any of the workshops. But I did attend both General Sessions Saturday, where I worked as a teller (a vote counter), and the ERA workshop, where I worked as a mike monitor. My first impression of the session was surprise at the large number of people there. The old stereotype of Kansas as a place where people are "out of it" and apathetic was triumphantly disproved by the fact that over 4,500 people, men as well as women, cared enough to come long distances to discuss the issues that concern them.

OVER AND over again, I saw examples of how much closer we all were than we are led to believe.

Only feminists are supposed to believe in sisterhood, but it was a member of the anti-ERA forces who tried to express it. She came to the row of pro-ERA people behind me and said, "I know a lot of things have been said and are going to be said, but I feel it's important for us to keep a feeling of love." The feminist look startled, and then smiled and said, "Thank you very much."

I even found the reciting of the Pledge of Allegiance, which Ms. Houston found so disgusting, an example of how much unites us. We all believe in a land of liberty and justice for all—we merely disagree on how that promise is to be kept. Again and again, we heard people echoing the concerns we all share. Women speaking against the ERA began by stating that, "Of course women should have equal opportunity and equal pay." Women speaking for the ERA spoke of their concern for the traditional family and its needs. Women on both sides spoke of the importance of the role of a housewife.

NATURALLY, we didn't agree on the methods of change. I never expected meetings to be quiet and agreeable. Actually, I was impressed by how well everyone behaved. Anytime there is a large group of people who genuinely care about certain issues, and wish to share their views, there is going to be a certain amount of chaos. (Witness any recent political convention!) But it is not just the moments of chaos I will remember.

I will remember how friendly people were to strangers, even in instances where they knew they disagreed on the issues. I will remember my counting partner, and how we teased each other about the fact that we voted exactly the opposite of each other on every issue. I will remember Sunday morning, waiting to hear the results of the election, and watching pro-ERA and anti-ERA people trying to think of hymns we all knew, and could sing together. Above all, I will always remember the fact that so many people, from so many different groups, cared enough to come and share their concerns in an exhausting but exciting weekend.

Shoplifting reduced by security systems

By KIM WASHINGTON
Collegian Reporter

Area managers agree shoplifting is one of the major problems in urban stores, but say Manhattan doesn't suffer as much as most.

"All stores have to watch out, but I think there's a problem everywhere," said Earl Alan, manager of Woody's Men Shop. "I think self service stores have a greater problem than we do."

There are several types of security systems stores can use to prevent the loss of merchandise, including security guards, monitoring cameras and alert salesmen.

Tana Livingood, manager of Keller's Too, said shoplifters are more apt to be professionals rather than students. Some women can fold a three-piece suit so it takes a minimal amount of space in a woman's purse or inconspicuously put one on under clothes.

K-State receives grant for workshop

K-State has received a $54,249 grant from the Federal Government to conduct the Administrator's Institute on Multi-cultural Curriculum (AIMC).

"This workshop is to help teachers and administrators to set-up a curriculum that will suit all races and ethnic backgrounds," said James Boyer, professor of curriculum and instruction.

"I see the curriculum as a preventive element. Appropriate curriculum content prevents discord, chaos and long term dissention. The curriculum accounts for what people think of each other across racial lines," Boyer said.

K-State was chosen by the superintendent of the Topeka school district to help with the program. Topeka schools are consolidating due to decreased enrollments and desegregation guidelines. The consolidation is the reason for the institute.

BOYER wants to help administrators and teachers identify materials (including TV, films, books and magazines) which are racially and ethnically unbiased and inform them on how these materials should be presented in a classroom situation.

Boyer will be assisted by two other professors in the College of Education, two K-State graduate students and consultants from other universities across the country.

Boyer has been involved in four other institutes of this nature.

The institute will run from July 25 to August 12. It's a volunteer program in which each participant will receive a $30 stipend for each day they attend the institute.

ALAN stated the biggest deterrent for the casual shoplifter is publicity. Students shoplift and would be embarrassed for their friends and family to know.

In many stores, personnel or managers have to catch the people with the merchandise in their possession outside of the store.

"When people get outside, there's a good chance that they will get away," Livingood said.

AREA MANAGERS said they don't prosecute everyone. If it's a person's first offense, they said they take the merchandise and inform the person never to shop there again.

"If the people return to the store, the police are called," Livingood said.

"Students who are charged with shoplifting can go to legal counseling on campus. We can advise them on the charges, court procedures and gathering information to turn over to an attorney," said Nyles Davis, student attorney.

IN THE STATE, penalties for petty larceny or shoplifting are in two degrees. For merchandise under $50, it is a class 'A' misdemeanor with a maximum of one year jail sentence and-or a monetary fine up to $2,500.

Merchandise over $50 is considered a class 'D' felony with a minimum jail sentence of one year or a maximum sentence up to 10 years and-or a monetary fine up to $5,000. These sentences are up to the presiding judge's discretion.

Stores hit by habitual shoplifters can have a restraining order issued by the court. This entitles the store to call the police if such a person enters the store and refuses to leave upon request.

Students lead groups in family, child development

Two hundred sixty-nine students have served as group facilitators in a class offered by the family and child development department since the fall of 1972.

These students are selected through an interviewing process and the key to judging their character is whether or not they possess a sense of responsibility, according to Joan McNeil, instructor of Introduction to Human Development.

Around 24 facilitators are selected each semester and each of these students have groups with 12 to 15 students they meet with twice a week.

The responsibilities of the facilitators involve assisting students in discussion, preparing group presentations, evaluating written work and course participation of students.

"Group facilitators seem to fit in with the philosophy of the course. I have a strong belief that students can learn from each other on a one-to-one or group basis, but format and structure are still needed. This is why the facilitators go through a training course which I teach and throughout the semester receive instruction from me," McNeil said.

"The group facilitators and small groups of students have proven to be a very viable academic learning experience. With these groups, personal attention and organized effort by the facilitator and their students is the key to success," McNeil said.

"When students are on their own level with other students it gives them a feeling that it's okay to be free to learn, to speak freely and to question things they might not do in a structured classroom situation," McNeil said.

Group facilitators gain a lot of practical experience in dealing with a mixture of people and learn to deal with "unusual" situations, according to McNeil.

Fine plot, characters make good 'whodunit'

"Murder on the Orient Express" is showing at 8:00 p.m. today in Union Little Theatre. Admission price is $1.

By JIM CHALFANT
Collegian Reviewer

On a train passing through Yugoslavia, a man is found dead in his berth with 12 stab wounds. His door is locked and chained from the inside and no one on the train seems to have had any reason to kill him.

I won't tell you anymore, because most of the fun of "Murder on the Orient Express" comes from trying to solve the crime yourself.

It won't be easy, though, because you'll be up against one of fiction's greatest detectives, Hercule Poirot. If you haven't read of his exploits in Dame Agatha Christie's novels, this movie is a great introduction. He's probably not as well known, but like Sherlock Holmes, Poirot is both a great detective and a memorable character.

POIROT is played by Albert Finney, who does a great job in this film. Over the years, Christie has developed Poirot into a complex character, but Finney seems to have no trouble with the part. He gives you the impression Christie had him in mind when she first created Poirot.

Along with Finney, the movie stars many other well-knowns, including Lauren Bacall, Martin Balsam, Ingrid Bergman, Jacqueline Bisset, Sean Connery, John Gielgud, Anthony Perkins, Vanessa Redgrave, Richard Widmark and Michael York. They make an entertaining, improbable group of characters, as Poirot searches among them for the solution to the murder.

"Murder on the Orient Express" begins with a newsreel-type report of the kidnapping of Daisy Armstrong. Apparently, the murder is tied in some way. Even with that clue so early in the film, you will probably be stumped throughout.

DIRECTOR Sidney Lumet should be congratulated for the way he handled the actors and their characters. He also added some fine music and photography, thus making the setting perfect for a good mystery.

Orient Express ranks with some of the greats in the genre of the 'whodunit,' and although the action may be a little slow for some, it is always challenging.

If you can guess the solution, you're wasting your time in college. There's a detective agency that could use you.

Air Force ROTC cadets to receive advanced training

Three K-State Air Force Reserve Officers' Training Corps (AFROTC) cadets will participate in the Advanced Training Program (ATP) this summer.

Steven MacLaird, junior in business and administration, is currently attending ATP at Shaw AFB, S.C. Shanan Shultz, junior in political science, is scheduled to arrive at Richards Gebaur AFB, Mo., July 24. Rick Seitz, junior in journalism, will be going to Chanute AFB, Ill., August 14.

Each cadet will attend one of 72 air force bases participating in the programs for a two-week period.

"The purpose of the program is to give the cadets a chance to spend an extended period of time actually living on a base and observing close hand the people working, the environment and possibly the jobs the student may become interested in when he or she goes on active duty," said Col. Clarence Clark, professor of aerospace studies.

"The desired goal of ATP is at the conclusion of the program, the cadet will have a greater appreciation for the duties, problems, responsibilities and the training which the cadet will encounter after college graduation and commissioning as second lieutenant in the air force."

SELECTIONS of cadets for the volunteer program are made on the basis of academic performance and performance at summer field training. Clark said the area commandant selects those to be nominated for the program and AFROTC headquarters at Maxwell Air Force Base in Alabama makes the final selections.

In order to qualify for the program, a cadet must have completed summer field training and be between his junior and senior year in college.

Clark said this is the first year the program has been in existence, but there have been similar programs at the service academies for some time.

Security Council advocates Vietnam's U.N. membership

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y. (AP)—The Security Council unanimously recommended Vietnam for U.N. membership Wednesday and the Vietnamese representative called on the United States not to "shirk" on reconstruction aid.

The council decision cleared the way for the General Assembly to admit Vietnam in September along with newly independent Djibouti, boosting U.N. membership to 149 countries.

Vietnamese U.N. observer Dinh Ba Thi thanked speakers who, as he put it, had demanded that the United States "should fulfill its responsibility to contribute to healing the wounds of war and to postwar reconstruction of Vietnam."

U.S. delegate Donald McHenry described Thi's comment as "restrained" and refused to discuss the issue of U.S. postwar aid to Vietnam with reporters.

"That question is the subject of discussions in Paris, not here," he said.

Dropping of the U.S. veto to Vietnam membership climaxed 23 years of American opposition to the Vietnamese Communists that began in 1954, when President Dwight Eisenhower first sent military advisers to back up the anti-Communist South. The bloody war that eventually followed ended with a cease-fire agreement signed in Paris on Jan. 23, 1973.

THE CEASE-FIRE agreement said the United States would "contribute to healing the wounds of war and postwar reconstruction" of Vietnam and throughout Indochina.

U.S. officials have contended that the commitment is not valid because North Vietnam itself violated the agreement by attacking the South and overwhelming it little more than two years later.

The council acted by so-called consensus, without a vote, in adopting the resolution recommending Vietnam for membership.

Its admissions committee on the whole had arranged that procedure to spare the United States a choice between voting for Vietnam or abstaining.

But McHenry told the reporters he had been prepared to vote "yes" had there been the usual show-of-hands.

Cat's title hopes aided by recruits

By TOM FAULKNER
Collegian Reporter

Atmosphere, a good coaching staff and a winning tradition—that's what has impressed incoming freshmen basketball players Rolando Blackman, Kevin Ogle and Greg Prudhoe to sign with K-State.

Blackman, a 6'7" forward from Brooklyn, Nev. York, was recruited by 250 schools across the nation.

"When it came down to making a decision I had three choices left: K-State, Marquette and Centenary," Blackman said.

"I chose K-State because of the winning tradition, plus Coach Hartman is a great coach. He is a very strict disciplinarian, and I wanted to play under him," he said.

ACCORDING to Blackman, adjusting to college basketball will be difficult at the first of the season.

"Rebounding will be harder and scoring won't be as easy as it was in high school because the players are much stronger," Blackman said.

"I hope to adjust right away so I can help K-State win the title again next year," he said.

weak areas and hopefully I can use what he teaches me later on if I get to play professional ball," he said.

OGLE, a 6'8" forward, was recruited by K-State, the University of Arkansas, the Naval Academy and, according to Ogle, a little by the University of Kentucky.

"I signed with K-State because of the atmosphere," Ogle said.

"The people here are friendly, the players are warm and it is a good place to go to school," the Edmond, Oklahoma native said. "I also wanted to play for Coach Hartman."

LEARNING the style of college basketball is a whole new ballgame, and Ogle hopes to learn it in his first season.

"The offense will be new and I am going to be playing people as big, and even bigger than I am," Ogle said.

"Rebounding and scoring is going to be a lot tougher," he said. "I have a lot of respect for Coach Hartman, and I know he will make a better player out of me so I can help later on."

According to Ogle, K-State will have a better team next season than last year.

"I look for K-State and Oklahoma to be the top two teams in the Big Eight this year," he said.

PRUDHOE, a 6'11" center, who comes to K-State from Peoria, Ill., was recruited by K-State, Iowa State, North Carolina-Charlotte and New Mexico State.

"I came to K-State because of the coaching staff, the people are easy to get along with and K-State is a major school with a winning tradition," Prudhoe said.

According to Prudhoe, you don't find many high school basketball players his size, and that is what his transition will be.

Prudhoe said that while in high school he was taller than everyone else, but would have to adjust at college because he will be playing against people his size.

"Hopefully I can make the transition soon, because I want to contribute to a winning team," Prudhoe said.

PLAYING for Jack Hartman will be a learning experience. At least that is what Prudhoe believes.

"I want to learn as much as I can, that way I will be able to get done what he wants done," he said.

With the players K-State has returning, Prudhoe also likes the Wildcats chances next year.

"We have a strong team returning, and we are going to have a lot of leadership, that will help too," Prudhoe said.

"We will be a very good team," he said.

ROLANDO BLACKMAN. . . 6'5" forward from New York

As far as next season is concerned, Blackman is looking forward to it.

"We have a very good team coming back, we have strong players, like Mike and Curtis, and if the freshmen can be of help, I think we will win the Big Eight," he said.

According to Blackman, he came to K-State with hopes of someday playing professional basketball.

"I came to play for Coach Hartman, because I know he will build my skills and strengthen my

Union backs out of Manhattan bid

By KEN MILLER
Managing Editor

The Kansas Public Employees Union has temporarily withdrawn its bid to collectively represent Manhattan's non-administrative employees.

In a surprise move Thursday, the union decided not to pursue its intention that the city engaged in unfair election practices before the union election last April. Union officials said last May they planned on appealing the decision by the state Public Employees Relations Board (PERB) that the tie election constituted a victory for "no representation" and a victory for city management.

The tie was the first in the history of Kansas union elections. Because of conflicting state statutes, however, PERB director Jerry Powell delayed a decision on the election until the following day.

PERB regulations call for a runoff election in the event of a tie, while another state statute gives the victory to "no representation" because a majority of employees didn't indicate they would join a union if given the chance.

THE UNION objected to Powell's decision, and filed the request for PERB reconsideration on May 2.

In its request, the union cited behavior by Manhattan City Manager Les Reiger, which, it said, may have unfairly influenced employee voting.

Reiger sent three letters to employees' homes urging them to vote against the union, and an anti-union cartoon was attached to several employees' pay check stubs.

If the union had been certified, Manhattan employees would have had the option to be represented by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, AFL-CIO. Because of state right-to-work laws, however, union membership must be voluntary.

Union attorney Terry Watson informed PERB members Thursday that the union was withdrawing its request. He gave no indication if or when the union might try to hold another election in Manhattan.

WATSON GAVE no immediate reasons for the withdrawal, other than to say the union anticipates another confrontation with the city to gain the employees' "best interests," and that he thought some of the support for the union had eroded since the April 5 election.

A city employee told the Collegian shortly after the April election that he thought much of the employee support for the union was evaporating, and that a second bid for union certification probably would fail.

Some of the original union organizers and supporters at the time of the election have since either resigned from their jobs with the city or have become less vocal in favor of the union.

Under state statute, a second election cannot be held until next April. Watson, however, said Thursday that another union bid could be made under a different organization.

"We're still very much interested in Manhattan," he said.

New fire codes may change dorm decor

By LISA SANDMEYER
Collegian Reporter

Residence hall remodeling may take on a new style due to the Kansas Fire Marshal's building regulations listed last week. The regulations state:

—"Any materials used must have a flame spread number no greater than 75. A label or manufacturer's statement to this effect must be available for fire inspectors.

—"Carpeting and rugs may be used, but floors may not be elevated.

—"Regular beds may be bunked only to the height of the standard bunk beds (now in some halls). Sleeping lofts will no longer be permitted.

—"Doors or passageways which limit egress (exit) shall not be installed.

—"Additional wiring for electrical equipment or lighting effects may not be used. This refers to improvised wiring. Wiring approved by the authority having jurisdiction and installed by a licensed electrician is acceptable.

—"Construction may not obstruct air circulation through the convactor units. This regulation pertains to all heating units. No construction will be allowed which hampers the building heating system."

"Of all the rules, I can understand them all except the flame spread," said Terry Matlack, student body president.

FLAME RETARDENT materials are not available in this area, according to Don Ireland of the Kansas Lumber Company, Manhattan.

Ireland said most builders use steel or masonry when required to use flame retardant materials.

Treated wood is very expensive, Ireland said, and must be ordered from the West Coast.

"It seems right now that it's going to be difficult to obtain materials with flame spread less than 75," Matlack said.

Flame spread is a laboratory rating of how fast wood burns. Furniture used in residence halls does not meet the requirement but is accepted as furnishings, said Paul Markley, fire protection agent with the fire marshal's office.

Elevated floors and sleeping lofts have been banned because smoke rises and higher floors and beds put the residents closer to injury by smoke, Markley said.

EXTENSION cords will be allowed as long as cords are not strung together.

The K-State Housing department has limited access to residents' rooms to see regulations are being followed, said Thomas Frith, director of housing.

The fire marshal is authorized to inspect state buildings during "reasonable" hours, but, ordinarily, a warrant is needed to search, according to Nyles Davis, student attorney.

The regulations are the result of a survey of all state universities conducted after the Kappa Sigma fraternity house at Baker University, Baldwin, burned last August, killing five persons.

"It (fire regulations on buildings) hasn't been a big issue at other campuses," Matlack said, adding none of the student body presidents at other regents schools had received a copy of the regulations. Residents in other university housing across the state do as much building as K-State, he said.

House OKs wheat subsidies estimated at $450 million

WASHINGTON (AP)—Taxpayer subsidies to wheat farmers who fail to get $2.90 a bushel for their grain this year were approved Thursday by the House after the Carter administration and House leadership gave up their opposition.

The House Agriculture Department estimates that the higher wheat supports could cost about $450 million.

Faced with unexpected success in lobbying by three second-term wheat state Democrats who forged a compromise coalition with urban congressmen, the chairman of the House Agriculture Committee proposed the boost to a level that President Carter has said he would veto.

THE VOTE came as the House was in its third day of debate on legislation to renew and revise the Agriculture Department's crop price support, Food for Peace, food stamp and research programs. They expire Sept. 30.

The USDA pays farmers the difference if their average market price falls below a specified target price, now $2.47 a bushel for wheat.

The House Committee and Carter, who originally wanted no change in the 1977 level and $2.65 next year, were together at $2.65 on the current crop and $3 next year.

The Senate adopted levels of $2.90 for this year and $3.10 in 1978, and the President said he would veto the bill if that's how the final legislation came out.

But Reps. Max Baucus, D-Mont.; Glenn English, D-Okla., and Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, backed by colleagues from other wheat states, put together a massive lobbying effort, persuading colleagues that higher supports were the only way to avoid thousands of farm bankruptcies.

BY WEDNESDAY morning, they had 277 votes, 59 more than a majority and including the entire New York City delegation, which usually fights higher supports as a threat to food prices.

The urban representatives in turn got assurances of no serious attacks from the farm-belt conservatives on the proposed revamping of the $5.4-billion food stamp program.

Wheat supports, virtually dormant since 1973, are being triggered now because surpluses and lower foreign demand for U.S. grain have depressed prices below production costs.

Ft. Riley provides transportation

Helicopters: ambulances of the sky

By RICK SEITZ
Collegian Reporter

Since its inception, the 82nd medical detachment (helicopter ambulance) at Fort Riley has had only one person die while on board a helicopter in transit.

"The person was one of a set of premature twins," said Capt. Roger Opio, operations officer for the detachment. "Sixty per cent of all our MAST (Military Assistance to Safety and Traffic) missions involve premature infants and cardiac cases. Very few are auto accidents.

"Kansas has a good system set up for medical support, in most cases they can get an ambulance to the scene of an accident quicker than we could get a helicopter there."

The ambulance system must be set up well. After receiving a call, a helicopter is off the ground in two to three minutes and traveling at speeds up to 143 mph. As soon as a call comes in, the crew that is on alert is scrambled.

THE CO-PILOT and crew chief start the helicopter and begin going through an abbreviated checklist while the pilot and the medic get the details of the mission. If something is wrong with the first helicopter, a second is already primed and ready to go.

"Two helicopters are always kept on alert status 24 hours a day," Opio said. "If the first doesn't work, the second will."

Each helicopter is equipped with such things as a respirator, a Hope respirator (in case the regular one fails), a backboard, sterile water, a special heating system and a bag of IVs. The helicopters can accommodate as many as six litters at one time if necessary.

"We usually preach just three litters in a helicopter around here," said Maj. John Owens, commander of the 82nd medical detachment. "It makes it a lot easier for the medic to render any medical treatment.

"We have two basic missions, first we provide direct support for medical air evacuation services to the first infantry division and Fort Riley; second, we provide civilian lift capabilities which we call our MAST missions," Owens said.

"One of the agreements we made when the service was established is that we would not compete with civilian ambulance services for business, since there is no cost to the patient for transport when our service is utilized," he said.

OWEN said anyone in a position of responsibility, such as a highway patrolman, a doctor or a head nurse on the staff of a hospital can request a helicopter, but are always asked whether ground transportation has been considered.

"We are there only to provide assistance," Owen said. "All the coordination is done prior to picking up the patient. The doctor tells us where to pick them up at, what care to give them in flight and what hospital to go to."

Last year the detachment flew 366 hours on MAST missions and 347 hours on military missions. The average flight time for each mission was about four hours.

"The amount of missions we fly varies from month to month," Opio said. "Sometimes we don't fly at all for MAST. Sometimes the world is healthy." When they do fly, most of their missions involve some type of transport from one hospital to another.

"It (the detachment) has been a very important link in the statewide program. They have been a very dedicated group who have been instrumental in saving the lives of premature infants," said Howard Fox, director of the division of Neonatal Medicine and associate professor in the Department of Pediatrics at the University of Kansas Medical Center.

"If the referring hospital is within 100 miles of the center we use the Jay Stork mobil unit. We request airlift when the baby is over 100 miles away or if the roads are too hazardous to travel on, such as last winter when the roads were iced over," Fox said.

Because the 82nd detachment is a medical unit, most of its members take some sort of medical training. Sometime during their career, all army pilots take a medical training course for army aviators. Medics receive 385 hours of instruction when they take the medical specialist training course.

SINCE the problems they encounter while on MAST differ from military missions, they take an added 200 hours of training called the Emergency Medical Technicians Course. Because most of their business involves premature infants, the medics take an additional 40 hours of training on neonatal care at the University of Kansas Medical Center.

"When we get a chance, we try to rotate our people through the hospital (Irwin Army Hospital)," Owen said. "For example, somebody will work in the operating room for a day and the next time he may work in the emergency room for a day."

"We had a girl in Great Bend with six per cent of her body burned. We had to transport her to the K.U. Medical Center," Opio said. "All we did was put of couple of tubes in her and a way you go."

THERE are those times, however, when things get tense.

During the night of Aug. 26, 1976, a call came in that an 18-year-old soldier needed to be airlifted to the hospital from one of Ft. Riley's firing ranges. The log didn't say what was wrong with the soldier, only that he went into cardiac arrest, respiratory arrest or both nine times during a 10 minute flight.

International post given to professor

Jacob Mosier, professor of surgery and medicine in the College of Veterinary Medicine, was recently named vice president of the World Veterinary Association (WVA).

Mosier was named to the post at the annual meeting of the association's permanent committee in Paris.

"The purpose (of the WVA) is to improve veterinary education, to exchange faculties, to allow arrangements where students can go from one country to another and to hold the world congress every four years," Mosier said.

The world congress, next summer in Moscow, is designed to share information with member countries on various topics in veterinary medicine. The congress is organized in seminar fashion and will present research information on many different topics in the field of veterinary medicine.

International signs appear in Manhattan

International street signs are making their appearance on Manhattan streets.

"The international street signs are being phased in as replacements for older signs," said Bruce McCallum, Manhattan city engineer. "We (city engineers) are under no mandate to finish the replacement phase."

"The replacement phase comes under the normal sign replacement, so there is no additional cost to the city," McCallum said.

THE INTERNATIONAL street signs are being intermingled with the older signs so people will become familiar with the new signs before a complete transaction occurs.

"So far crews have only put up 'no parking' and 'no turn' signs," McCallum said. "There have been no inquiries as to their meaning, only favorable comments.

"The city orders the signs from a supply company or we (city engineer employees) make them," McCallum said. "It depends how many we need whether we order them or make them."

The replacement phase began the middle of April.

CAIRO, Egypt—Libyan forces invaded western Egypt with tanks and planes Thursday but were repelled in a major desert battle near the border village of Salum, Egypt reported. Libya called the report a "lie" and said Egypt was the invader.

Libya claimed Egyptian forces had crossed into its territory and Egyptian planes had bombed a village.

An Egyptian military spokesman said, "There has been fighting but we have not declared war."

The battle followed a series of incidents along the border between the two North African Arab nations, which once talked of union but have become increasingly hostile since a bitter policy disagreement at the time of the 1973 Middle East war.

CHARLESTON, S.C.—President Carter again pledged himself Thursday to a long-range quest for solid relations between America and the Soviet Union, saying his goal is not for easy or transient agreements but "solutions that are meaningful, balanced and lasting."

In a speech clearly aimed as much at Soviet and other world leaders as his immediate audience of Southern legislators, the President called for "a relationship of cooperation that will be rooted in the national interests of both" countries.

The address broke no new hard proposals for U.S.-Soviet relations, but it obviously was designed to signal the Russians that the government is concerned about the recent spate of bitter exchanges—as well as to assure Western allies that America has a long-term strategy for dealing with the Communist giant.

Carter's speech to the Southern Legislative Conference kicked-off a two-day working swing through the South that also would take him to a citizens meeting in Yazoo City, Miss., before the day was out.

WASHINGTON—U.S. Steel Corp announced a price increase on Thursday and was immediately criticized for it by the Carter administration, which said the price action is "clearly inconsistent with efforts to control the inflation rate."

The company blamed the increase on a rise in employment costs on Aug. 1 and on other cost increases.

Charles Schultze, chairman of President Carter's Council of Economic Advisors, said he had discussed U.S. Steel's price hikes with Carter who "expressed his sharp disappointment with this development."

Schultze said he had discussed U.S. Steel's price hikes with Carter who "expressed his sharp disappointment with this development."

WASHINGTON—Former Special Watergate Prosecutor Leon Jaworski, hired to direct the House investigation of alleged Korean influence-buying, said Thursday that he'll recommend prosecution of any wrongdoing no matter who is hurt.

"If I find a crook involved in this matter, I want to bring him out and I want the public to know about it," Jaworski told a news conference in Houston.

"It will make no difference to me who is involved in this matter, be they Republicans or Democrats," he said.

DETROIT—Al Cowns had four hits and drove in five runs while Paul Splittorff fired a four-hitter as the Kansas City Royals crushed the Detroit Tigers 8-1 Thursday night.

The victory was the seventh in a row for the Royals, and left the defending champions just two games behind the idle Chicago White Sox in the American League West.

Bus transports aged citizens

By DIANE GONZOLAS
Collegian Reporter

For many senior citizens getting where they want to go can be a problem.

The Aging Transportation Agency (ATA) bus is designed to provide inexpensive transportation for elderly citizens in Manhattan.

"The first objective of the bus is to provide transportation for medical reasons," said V.E. McAdams, president of the ATA board. The bus, however, will provide transportation for other reasons. ATA also puts on special trips such as shopping excursions and trips to Arts in the Park.

A DISPATCHER takes phone calls Monday through Friday from those needing transportation and then sets up a schedule for the bus driver. The driver goes to the homes of the callers to pick them up and also takes them back. ATA currently has one full-time bus driver.

"The driver is a pretty important part of our operation," McAdams said. "She either makes us or breaks us."

The bus, said McAdams, is different than a taxi in that the driver must often go to the door and help the elderly person to the bus. The driver must have an understanding of the elderly and know how to handle them.

A DONATION of 30 cents is requested for the bus service, but McAdams said it is not mandatory.

"If they can't pay we don't turn them away," he said. "That's our number one policy."

ATA was organized in early 1975. Policy is set by a board consisting mainly of volunteer retirees. The dispatcher, the bus driver and the director who runs the general operation are paid for their work.

FINANCIAL backing for ATA comes from various sources, said McAdams. Money has been received from Community Education Training Act (CETA), Housing and Urban Development (HUD), city revenue sharing funds, county funds, donations and Green Thumb, a federal agency. ATA has applied for other federal funds.

McAdams said ATA would like to expand their services to other area communities.

"We're trying to purchase a new bus and a second bus so we can serve the county," he said.

Professor to study at Oxford

By EUGENE PERKINS
Collegian Reporter

How a full-grown organism develops from a single fertilized cell has always fascinated man.

We know the single cell divides to form many identical cells, but why does one group of these cells from an arm, while another group of cells with the same genes forms a leg?

Vernon Bode, K-State professor of genetics and molecular biology, said he hopes to find answers to questions like this while spending a year researching early mammalian development at Oxford University in England.

BODE will be working with several Oxford professors, including Christopher Graham, who just finished co-writing a textbook covering the development of both plants and animals.

"We will be working to find basic information about how cells are regulated," Bode said.

Bode said most of the research will be done with mice embryos because they are small, most scientists are familiar with their genes and their gestation period is relatively short.

ALTHOUGH most of the funds for Bode's research will come from a scholarship grant he won in a nation-wide competition sponsored by the American Cancer Society, Bode said the goal of the research will not be to solve the problem of cancer, but to establish a groundwork of basic research so many problems, including cancer, can be handled intelligently in the future.

"The reason the space program progressed faster than the cancer program has is that scientists in the space program already had most of the technological knowledge they needed when the program began and just needed money to put it to use," Bode said. "We don't have the technological knowledge needed to battle cancer or other similar problems yet."

Bode will leave for England on Aug. 15 and will return in time for the 1978 fall semester.

Bode said he will use the knowledge he gains while doing research at Oxford in his classes as well as his own research when he returns to K-State.

Carter molds media

President Carter, during his campaign, pledged to bring the people closer to the man in the White House. Supposedly he is doing this through his attendance at various town meetings, first in Clinton, Mass. and now Yazoo City, Miss., and his phone-the-President radio show.

Despite what may be honest attempts to communicate with the American people, Carter has only succeeded in keeping the aura of the Presidency shrouded in mystery.

Carter's extension of himself to the populus is little more than a series of scheduled media events.

FOR EXAMPLE, in Clinton, Mass. the media moved in as soon as Carter announced he would visit that fair city and produced seemingly endless reels of trivial material.

While an outline of the history of the community may be interesting, it does not deserve the five minutes of television time it received. The newscasts which featured such materials were playing directly into Carter's hands.

The same thing is true of Carter's current visit to Yazoo City, Miss. Glossing over any issues which could be brought out and asked of the President, the media spend their time and words describing the clean-up process going on at the citizen's house where Carter is staying.

UNDOUBTEDLY all this suits Carter just fine. He does not have to deal with tough questions from the media on this kind of trip, he only has to make his token gesture of reaching out to the people.

Carter has indeed found an ingenious method of staying in the public eye. By being nontraditional, he is a "President who does things differently," and therefore a President worth a great deal of media attention.

Before we fall into the trap of thinking Carter is really listening to the people, let's take a close, hard look at the "substance" of his media events.

A lot of good things

"How can they say that about us?"

There is a hard side and a soft side to everything, a time to analyze and a time to bitch. Grant me the latter in at least one aspect of the media, thus, the reason for this page. The words you are about to hear-read are a compilation of "the latter" and are known professionally as a column.

After finally unwinding from the tension and grind of last weekend, I reflect in retrospect on the good and the bad of Kansas Women's Weekend. I hate to drive this thing into the ground, but it seems to have left a lot of people in high gear.

So, for the purposes of clarification, I will once again employ adjectives to describe the conference. Speaking objectively, it was tense and chaotic. I reiterate, tense and chaotic. That is not to say other large conferences are not, but a rose is a rose by any name.

What is sad is that people were looking for it to be. Why? Simply because it was accepted fact most of the participants would be women. And because they were, the tension and chaos is looked upon as self-evident truths instead of tension and chaos.

Being an avid feminist and supporter of human rights, I wish it would have run more diplomatically. Had I been able to attend the event solely in the capacity of a feminist, I, too, would be upset if someone told me a lot of trivia was dealt with. However, I attended and perceived the conference in terms of a writer.

Obviously, feminists who are emotionally, personally and subjectively perceiving the conference, as most of them probably were, refuse to acknowledge any chaos occurred at all.

Certainly. The proceedings were very orderly.

Directions on how to register were provided and signs were posted. The workshops from which the fair, representative resolutions came were open to all registrants (or they wouldn't be truly representative, right?). An elevator did not break down. No profanity was heard. Everyone was allowed to cast a vote on each resolution and no one did "the latter" concerning children occupying registrants' seats. It was easy to get to a mike and no one was called out of order. Everyone there, infant to senior citizen, knew Robert's Rules of Orders upside down and inside out. No one booed. The anti-ERA's clapped at Addie Wyatt's and Gloria Steinem's speeches and when one of their people told the chairman she was "out of order," everyone took it in stride and applauded congenially. There was really a good balance of people there, enough to keep all the seesaws in Kansas working forevermore. No one voted in blocs and everyone was highly sympathetic and very listening of differing points of view.

And oranges don't grow in Florida.

I am on the defensive for my sisters in feminism, too, but I am willing to admit women are not perfect. A Kansas Plan of Action was completed after one round of priority resolutions instead of the planned three rounds. Many issues which needed attention did not get it because of a seemingly unavoidable focus on the Equal Rights Amendment. There are over 2 million people living in Kansas and four and a half thousand represented the state sentiment on equal rights for men and women on various issues.

A lot of good things came out of last weekend's meeting. A lot of good things.

Letters to the editor

'Weekend' column misleading

Editor:

I am writing in response to the column by Velina Houston in the July 19 issue of the Collegian. As a participant in the Kansas Women's Weekend, I feel her article is a bit misleading and some of the items reported make me wonder where Ms. Houston actually was. For example, the little old woman was not speaking to the chairwoman as reported but instead was speaking to an "anti-ERA" delegate who was unwilling to give up the microphone.

The speaker from the floor who used the term "ladies" sarcastically was a man who seemed to have no reason for being there except to disrupt the meetings. He was representative of those who came prepared to debate parliamentary procedure rather than issues and even had a copy of Robert's Parliamentary Procedures, which he quoted from whenever he had the chance.

Homemakers need ERA

Editor,

Although we agree with the pro-ERA stance established in your July 19 editorial, we must take exception to your condescending attitude toward homemakers and to your narrow view of the proposed Equal Rights Amendment.

By your choice of words, the editorial suggested that the role of the homemaker is neither admirable nor respectable, and by implication that the homemaker has no need to seek equal rights. ("Some women desire more than a home and family. They want a career... Women who wish to stay home and raise families will still be able to do so.") The ERA seeks to bar sexual discrimination under the law for all women in all roles, including that of the homemaker.

The concerns of the women's movement go beyond removing obstacles to women seeking careers and employment outside the home. The tenor of arguments such as yours serves to divide rather than unite women in seeking equal rights.

We hope that in the future you will choose your words more carefully so as to not irritate and alienate a segment of the populace for whom you want equal rights. We further hope that you will explore the broader importance of the proposed Equal Rights Amendment.

Tennis teams add youth and skill

By EUGENE PERKINS
Collegian Reporter

As could be expected, the K-State men's and women's tennis teams didn't set the world on fire this spring, the first season tennis was reinstated as a varsity sport at K-State.

The men won only five of the 30 matches they played and finished last in the Big Eight tournament. The women fared better, winning half of their matches and placing sixth in the Big Eight tournament.

However, K-State tennis coach Steve Snodgrass is determined to bring the level of K-State tennis back to what it was when he played as a senior in 1970 when the men's team took second in the Big Eight.

"Our backs are against the wall," Snodgrass said. "The other Big Eight schools have full scholarships for five people to offer, but we don't have any."

DESPITE this handicap, Snodgrass said several players are coming to K-State this year who are capable of helping the men's tennis team tremendously.

Coming to K-State from the high school ranks are standouts Scott Darvey from Shawnee Mission, Jim Hunt from Wichita, Steve Mohler from Arkansas City and Mark Dechant from Belleville, Ill.

John Nelson, a transfer from Purdue University, is also high on the list of recruits, but according to NCAA rules will have to sit out a year before he becomes eligible to play for K-State. "Nelson will definitely play high up on the team when he becomes eligible," Snodgrass said.

SNODGRASS said Rolando Blackman from New York, one of Jack Hartman's top basketball recruits, may also be one of K-State's top tennis prospects this year.

"I've heard some good things about him," Snodgrass said, "and Jack (Hartman) told me he'd be more than happy to let him play."

Sports

Kurt Reid and John Runnels, a pair of sought-after players from Topeka, may or may not be coming to K-State.

Snodgrass said Reid is planning to go to Washburn University in Topeka this year. But he will not play tennis there, so he can come to K-State next year and still have four years of eligibility. Runnels is still undecided about his college plans.

"If we get Reid and Runnels, we should be in the middle division of the Big Eight," Snodgrass said.

SNODGRASS teamed with another former K-State player, Dave Hoover, to beat Reid and Runnels in the finals of the men's doubles at the recent Manhattan Open Tennis Tournament.

"I introduced them (Reid and Runnels) to the crowd as K-State's top tennis recruits before the match began and they got a big round of applause," Snodgrass said. "I hope it impressed them enough to bring them to K-State."

Snodgrass said the women's tennis team will be strong this year.

"We only lost the number one and number six players from last year's team and we have several talented players coming in from Kansas City," Snodgrass said.

"We hope to be in the top half of the Big Eight."

CANDY GWIN from Prairie Village is one of the prospects coming to K-State from the Kansas City area.

"Candy is one of the top five or six women players in Kansas City," Snodgrass said, "and should help us out tremendously."

Snodgrass also said he expects good things from Caroline Howard, a Shawnee Mission native.

The women will play half of their 24 matches in the fall and half in the spring. The men will play a full 30-game schedule in the spring.

Besides helping bring top men and women tennis players to K-State, Snodgrass has been promoting tennis in several other ways.

He taught clinics in Great Bend and Manhattan this summer with the assistance of Doug Reinhart and Mary Lou Kultgen, two of K-State's top tennis players.

THIRTY people participated in the clinic at Great Bend and 60 attended the Manhattan clinic.

"The Manhattan clinic keeps growing year after year," Snodgrass said. "We have kids coming in from three or four states."

Snodgrass is also working with Recreational Services and Continuing Education to raise money to resurface at least five of the courts at the Washburn Complex.

"We need $5,000 to resurface the courts with flexi-paint," Snodgrass said. "Rec Services is willing to put $2,500 toward the resurfacing if Continuing Ed will match that amount."

"The flexi-paint will not only cut glare," Snodgrass said, "but it will also provide for a little slower surface, which makes tennis more fun to play and to watch."

Beesley expected to lead harriers

By EUGENE PERKINS
Collegian Reporter

Larry Beesley, who placed second in the Big Eight meet last year as a sophomore, is expected to lead a young K-State cross country team this fall.

Beesley just missed making All-American in cross country last year. He was the 26th American across the line at the NCAA championship cross country meet last year, but only the top 25 made All-American.

Beesley holds the K-State cross country record at 10,000 meters with a time of 29:35.

"Larry is probably the best cross country runner I've ever seen in the Big Eight conference," said Jerome Howen, cross country coach.

Another top returner for K-State is senior distance captain Doug Weber. Weber was the third K-State finisher at the Big Eight meet last year.

HOWE said he also expects senior Jeff Rosenow, junior Tim Davis and sophomores Greg Glass, Brian Sanchez, and Ed Delashmutt too place high for K-State this fall.

Two incoming freshman Howe believes strengthen the team are Rick McKean from Missouri Valley, Iowa, who won the Iowa state high school cross country meet last year, and Pete Riley from Cedar Rapids, Iowa, a 4:16 miler.

"We hope to place in the top three (in the Big Eight)," Howe said. "Colorado will have a very strong team this year and it would take a super effort from us to beat them."

City couple enjoys life on the farm

By MARY LOU PETER
Collegian Reporter

Ah, for the nice peaceful quiet of the country life. Such were Bud and Val Peterson's thoughts when they moved to the country.

In the year since the move, they haven't regretted their decision.

The Peterson's are both from the Kansas City area. They graduated from suburban high schools where such organizations as Future Farmers of America and 4-H are almost unheard of.

Val Peterson is a 1975 K-State graduate and will be a K-State graduate teaching assistant in Spanish this fall. She is a former director of Moore Hall and currently teaches aerobic dancing.

Bud Peterson is a graduate student in mathematics education and will teach math at the Wabunsee County High School this fall. He will also serve as head track coach and assistant football coach there. Football fans at K-State will remember him as a wide-receiver in the early 1970s.

DURING their year in Moore Hall, the Petersons were faced with the decision of where to go when their jobs there ended.

About that time Bud, while working for a local tree service, discovered a deserted farmhouse on what was the Dewey Ranch. After talking with the owner and inspecting the house's plumbing and septic tank, the Petersons were allowed to move in.

It was agreed they could live there until 1979 and that they could improve the house as they wished.

Since the Petersons moved, the 7,200-acre ranch has been purchased and donated to K-State. It is now part of the Konza Prairie Research Area. The Petersons were able to remain in the house, however.

The Petersons have done most of the renovation on the 78-year old house themselves.

"They (the previous owners) used to store farm equipment in here," Val said. The Petersons spent much of the summer of 1976 cleaning, repairing and painting.

"There were holes in the bathroom and kitchen floors where people had come in and stolen the copper wiring," she said.

By July 1976 the Petersons were ready to work on the outside of the house and had a painting party.

"We invited over all of our friends and fed them lunch in return for painting," Val said.

AT THAT POINT, the farm consisted of the Petersons, their dog, Daisy and a cat. A son, Sean, was born last February. Various animals, including 40 chickens have been added and Val has started a weekly egg route in Manhattan.

Recently the couple attended a University for Man sponsored dairy goat class and purchased a goat.

Along with the animals have come new responsibilities, Val said. They are not able to take off on weekend trips as easily as they used to.

The work is worth it, according to Bud, now considering buying a cow and possibly a horse.

MOST OF their furniture has been purchased at area estate sales. Their $6 stove, Val says, works great. They recently purchased a $1 washing machine which he was able to repair.

On the land the Petersons occupy are several outbuildings including an old stone barn, and a spring house. The spring house, a small stone building built into the side of a hill, once housed butter and other perishable dairy products. Even today, although not in use, the interior of the building stays cool.

AMONG the advantages country living affords the Petersons are their own spring-fed swimming hole and a lot of privacy.

The house is heated exclusively by two wood-burning stoves.

"I was afraid we'd always smell like a campfire," Val said.

The amount of heat released can vary, according to the type of wood burnt and how wide the damper is open.

Living in the country has its disadvantages, according to Val.

"One bad thing about the wood-burning system is that it heats unevenly," she said. One room may be so hot it's uncomfortable while the next will be an optimum temperature. Also, during very cold weather, at least one pick-up truck-load of firewood is needed per week.

UNTIL a bridge was installed in August, 1976, the couple had to drive through a stream bed to reach their house.

"There were times last summer when I had to wake Bud up in the middle of the night to move the cars across the stream so we could get to work the next day," Val said.

Now that there is a bridge there is usually no problem, although during the recent heavy rains they have been flooded in.

The Petersons' first garden was planted last year with both hoping for a bountiful harvest.

"One day an airplane came over, flying very low and dipping its wings. We thought it was some friends of ours returning from their honeymoon and went out and waved to them," Val said. "All of a sudden dark stuff started coming out of it."

The plane turned out to be a crop-duster, destroying certain wooded areas on the ranch to make room for more pasture. It also destroyed the Petersons' first garden.

Unemployment rate low for Kansans

By SHEREE LOWE
Collegian Reporter

Unemployment is a controversial issue for many, but Kansans can be proud of the fact the unemployment rate in their state is consistently low in comparison to the other 49 states in the U.S.

"Kansas is one of a few states whose trust fund is solvent and borrowing money from the federal loan fund is not needed to operate," said Ernie Maxwell, chief of research and analyst of the Kansas Department of Human Resources.

Many states are in debt because of the loans they have to borrow to maintain existence, but Kansas has adequate reserves and this reduces the rate of unemployment tax Kansans pay.

THE REASON Kansas maintains a low rate of unemployment is due to the diversity of the industrial economy, according to Maxwell.

Kansas agricultural economy is not covered by the unemployment law, but serves as a stabilizing factor in the unemployment situation. Most towns in western Kansas range from zero to two per cent unemployment.

Wichita has the strongest single industry in the state. The effects of stability in the aircraft business have a direct reflection on the state's rate of unemployment, according to Maxwell.

"Another attractive factor that influences the state's unemployment rate is good productivity by business and a firm stability of work forces," Maxwell said.

"We are attracting a good quality of employers and employees. They are looking for good wages and a low rate of unemployment, therefore many graduates of colleges are seeking jobs in Kansas," Maxwell said.

THE ATTITUDES held by employers at present seem to be, "what do I have to pay to get good workers" and "a business has to spend money to make money."

In the month of May, Kansas was the fifth lowest state in the nation in terms of unemployment. The national, not seasonally adjusted, rate was 6.4 per cent and the rate for Kansas was 3.3 per cent. These statistics were almost repeated in the month of June, as Kansas held a rate of 3.9 per cent unemployment and the national average was 7.5 per cent.

THE PARTY'S OVER.

All too often, when the party ends, the trouble begins.

People who shouldn't be doing anything more active than going to sleep are driving a car. Speeding and weaving their way to death.

Before any of your friends drive home from your party, make sure they aren't drunk.

Don't be fooled because they drank only beer or wine. Beer and wine can be just as intoxicating as mixed drinks.

And don't kid yourself because they may have had some black coffee. Black coffee can't sober them up well enough to drive.

FRIENDS DON'T LET FRIENDS DRIVE DRUNK.

If someone gets too drunk to drive, drive him yourself. Or call a cab. Or offer to let him sleep over.

Maybe your friend won't be feeling so good on the morning after, but you're going to feel terrific.

Sadat orders halt to Libyan hostilities

CAIRO (AP)—President Anwar Sadat ordered an immediate halt last night to all hostilities with Libya, Cairo radio reported.

It said the order was given after talks began between Sadat and Algerian President Houari Boumediene, who arrived here on a mediation mission.

The order came after four days of air raids and border clashes between the two North African rivals. Libya said that Egyptian warplanes struck deep into Libyan territory Sunday and that 14 of the planes were shot down. It reported that one Egyptian pilot who bailed out was captured.

The Arab Revolutionary News Agency (ARNA) in Tripoli, Libya, said two Libyans and several Italians were killed in an Egyptian raid on the Al Kufra oasis, about 800 miles southeast of Tripoli.

AN EGYPTIAN military communique said Sunday night that its warplanes had attacked two Libyan radar stations near the frontier, one 18 miles west of the Al Adam air base and the other 30 miles southwest of Salum. It reported the positions were destroyed.

Rain, maybe!

School stresses individuality

By LISA SANDMEYER
Collegian Reporter

"A slight scream was heard," Sarah wrote. "Around the place nobody paid much attention to it. Because the place was located in a valley of the Moors."

In another part of the house, Regan, 10, compared two photographs.

"Different amounts of light came in. When you don't do (expose) a picture long enough, it just stays white," Regan said.

In the backyard of the house that serves as their school, Wendy, six, showed tiny Lisa how to wrap rubberbands on cloth for tie-dyeing.

A low clothesline held squares of drying fabric when the children finished their projects. Then it was off to other activities: Learning how to roll bulk film into camera-size rolls, finishing a math assignment and taking an ecology field trip in the neighborhood.

THE LAST day of the summer session at the Living Learning School, 1011 Osage, went much like any other school day. The 24 students arrived at 9 a.m., filled out their logbooks with their choices of the day's activities and went to work with the help of David Hursh and Sue Sandmeyer, their teachers and directors of the school.

The school is a private non-profit teacher-parent school for children aged five through thirteen (kindergarten through eighth grade).

Each student fills out a logbook at the beginning of the day, choosing the activities he wants to do that day, including things he must do.

AFTER LOGBOOKS are filled out, the students' curricula for the day are set. It isn't easy to change activities, according to Nathan Creps, 13, a student in the school's summer session.

"If it's math or English, they won't let you change it," Nathan said.

The school emphasizes a personal curriculum for students.

"It takes a while for children to learn how to plan their days," Sandmeyer said. "It's a big responsibility and we (the teachers) give them a lot of assistance."

THE LIVING Learning School's curriculum for all students is centered around media studies and each subject is integrated with other subjects.

"Media is writing, print, symbols, communication," Sandmeyer said. "There are technical aspects, for example, film making and developing and non-technical aspects, such as writing and critiquing."

For example, if a student chooses to make a film, he must first choose a subject and write a story or sequence of events for filming. He must also use technical skills during filming, such as counting frames per second, distance and lighting.

The school emphasizes the basics, Sandmeyer said, such as science, math, social studies, language arts and physical education.

THE ACADEMICS, however, are treated differently than in public schools, Hursh said. In science, students take hikes and practice dissecting. Writing is not a matter of practicing making letters of the alphabet but a time to write about things the children want to.

"When we talk to kids about writing, we try to have it relate to them," Hursh said. "We don't write for the sake of writing."

BECAUSE the school emphasizes individual progress, some children are academically ahead of public school children of the same age.

Wendy Greenhut, 6, can do second grade math. Regan Kirk, 10, learned how to do algebra this summer. Nathan Creps, who had trouble with math and English at another school, went from fifth grade level to eighth grade level in his six weeks at the school this summer.

Nathan's mother, Janet Sunderland, works as a volunteer at the school. They came to Manhattan from Texas at the beginning of the summer and chose the Living Learning School because Manhattan public schools weren't offering summer school.

"I have been amazed at how fast Nathan has progressed," Sunderland said. "And he's been excited about school here."

Sunderland, an art therapist who works with disturbed children, said she believes public schools don't teach personal responsibility and that there is a lack of individual attention in public schools.

"Some children can't deal with a public school environment," Sunderland said. "I was very pleased with the one-to-one relationship."

Ft. Riley soldiers to begin NATO exercises in Europe

By RICK SEITZ
Collegian Reporter

Soldiers from Ft. Riley's 1st infantry division will begin leaving for Germany Aug. 26 through Sept. 3 for the annual North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) exercise REFORGER (Redeployment Forces to Germany).

The 5,800 Ft. Riley soldiers will be among 12,000 combat troops from the United States participating in the exercise. Other soldiers will come from Ft. Carson, Colo.; Ft. Bliss, Tex. and Ft. Lewis, Wash.

The exercises are designed to meet commitments established in 1967 by the United States, United Kingdom and Germany to return army combat personnel from the United States to Germany.

"REFORGER is an evaluation of our ability to carry out our war-time mission and reassure our NATO allies that they won't have to go it alone," said Col. Isaac Smith, 1st infantry division chief of staff.

"Selected soldiers will be placed into German, Dutch, French, British and Belgian units," Smith said. "For two weeks soldiers will do what ever is on the host unit's training schedule."

SMITH SAID the program gives the soldier a chance to see how his NATO counterpart trains and lives.

He said some of the differences of REFORGER '77 and past REFORGERS is the increased differences in the types of transportation used and the increased involvement of NATO allies in logistical support as well as participation in the exercise.

Women in the army will also be evaluated during the exercise. "The Army is trying to determine how many women it should have to maintain its combat effectiveness. That evaluation will be extended to REFORGER in an effort to determine how well our women perform under extended field exercises."

"The primary aircraft in the airlift will be the C-141 Starlifter. Two C-5 Galaxies will also be used, too, for some of the overweight cargo such as vans and a computer system the army has," said Capt. Lynn Rollins, division airlift liaison officer.

One aspect of REFORGER will be to test military sealift abilities. Two military sealift command ships will cross the Atlantic using simulated wartime convoy procedures. The troops are scheduled to return to Ft. Riley in mid-October.

Courts condone 'invited' rape

For the second time in three months, an American court has ruled that a rapist is innocent if there is reason to believe the victim voluntarily placed herself in a situation where she might be assaulted.

There seem to be some judges who feel that, while rape is a terrible crime, well, men will be men and we'll just have to live with it.

Last May, a 15-year-old youth admitted he raped a 16-year-old girl. The judge said he thought the boy shouldn't be punished for reacting "normally" to provocative clothing and sexual permissiveness.

Since when is rape considered normal behavior?

LAST THURSDAY, a California appeals court ruled that "it would not be unreasonable for a man... to believe that a female (hitchhiker) would consent to sexual relations."

So with two decisions, courts have ruled that a woman who either dresses "provocatively" or who is hitchhiking is open game for the rapist.

Forget about morality and socially responsible behavior. Let's be quite certain that we don't send an admitted rapist to jail if he might have been "tempted" into rape because that's the way things are today.

Not only does this assinine logic reduce the chances of women reporting rapes for fear that the rapists will be released, it also delivers a frightening comment on the state of American morality.

RAPE IS a very serious crime. Alleged rapists shouldn't be convicted without indisputable evidence. But because an admitted rapist is released because what he did is considered "normal," and because court decisions have a nasty habit of setting precedents, these decisions pose an immediate threat to the safety and well-being of women.

It is a trend which should be stopped dead in its tracks before any more judges have a chance to chip away at accepted social morality.

Using these two decisions as precedents, follow the reasoning. If a woman who gets into a car for a ride gives the male driver a permit to rape her, will a woman who picks up a male hitchhiker also be subject to legal rape?

If a woman wearing "provocative" clothing tempts a man to rape her, are we to assume that any woman on any American beach can legally be raped?

If two judges prove themselves to be mindlessly irresponsible and unable to decide between right and wrong, are we to assume that all judges similarly wallow blissfully in ignorance?

It is an awesome problem if the moral fabric in this country has worn so thin to permit rape under any circumstances, let alone in these two flimsy cases.

Snowman strikes again

Something is amuck in the land of icebergs and polar bears.

I suspected the management of Alyeska weren't playing with a full barrel when they recently said a truck ran into the huge pipeline which spans much of the 49th state. Now I'm sure of it.

The mammoth 800-mile Alaskan pipeline has been plagued by difficulties since before it opened. Among the slippery calamities are the original leak shortly after the oil began flowing and an explosion at a pump station which ruptured the line.

NOT BELIEVING so many unrelated incidents could occur in such a short time, I phoned Pottsbury up in Anchorage to see if there's more to the pipeline problems than we're being told.

"I figured someone would start to wonder about all this," Pottsbury said. "I guess you folks down there are beginning to wonder about all these accidents."

He stressed the word "accidents."

"Well," I said, "it's getting pretty tough to understand how such a sophisticated endeavor as the pipeline could have so many problems."

"Sure," he said. "What I'm about to say won't be released by the Interior Department until at least a few more days, but you can bet your igloo that none of the problems up here are caused by either human or mechanical failures."

What else was there, I wondered to myself.

"Near every accident up here are huge footprints and signs reading, 'Oilman go home.'"

I dropped the phone.

"You don't mean..."

"Yep, it's hard to believe, I know, but it seems we've got an abominable snowman up here and we have reason to believe he's pretty upset about this pipeline thing."

"Holy mackerel," I said, "something like that could cause quite a stir down here."

"You guessed it," Pottsbury said. "Now you can understand why we've had to make up all these unbelievable stories about trucks crashing into the pipeline and such. You don't really think something this expensive could just leak by itself, do you?"

STRANGER things have happened, I thought.

"At first, we couldn't believe it," Pottsbury said. "We all thought the only abominable snowman was the one that used to follow climbers up Mt. Everest and steal the flags. But now we know for sure it's him."

And he's pretty bright too. We found out after the first leak that he tried to tap the pipeline and open up a Texaco station but the leaks after that seem to have been caused out of sheer frustration.

"What can you guys do about it," I asked. "Surely you'll run out of excuses if this keeps up."

"Don't be so sure, everyone's been buying them so far, haven't they? And besides, what's a few hundred thousand barrels of oil; there's plenty more where that came from."

SEOUL, South Korea—U.S. Defense Secretary Harold Brown, here to discuss planned U.S. troop withdrawals, told American soldiers along the demilitarized zone Sunday they must "remain fully combat ready" in the pullout period to deter a possible Communist attack.

Brown and South Korean Defense Minister Suh Jyong-chul made a day-long helicopter tour of U.S. and South Korean military posts and the American airbase at Osan. Brown saw a unit of Hawk missiles and peered at a North Korean observation post from a hilltop on the 151-mile-long, 5-mile-wide DMZ, which divides the north from the south.

Brown begins two days of talks Monday with Suh and South Korean President Park Chung-hee on President Carter's plan to pull out 33,000 ground troops of the 2nd U.S. Infantry Division.

NEW YORK—Lou Piniella singled home two runs in the first inning to power the New York Yankees past the Kansas City Royals 3-1 Sunday.

Starter Don Gullett, now 9-3, recorded the 100th victory of his major league career.

Kansas City scored in the fifth when, with two out, Gullett walked Fred Patek and Frank White. George Brett then collected the second of his four singles to drive in Patek before Hal McRae popped out.

Transportation styles alter; motorcycles now accepted

By DIXIE HOLMES
Collegian Reporter

Until the late 1960s, motorcycles weren't considered an acceptable form of transportation. Today it isn't uncommon to see a businessman in suit and tie riding his motorcycle to work.

Attitudes have changed and people have "quit seeing the biker as a menace to the public," said John Koontz, manager of Wisdom's Suzuki.

"The cyclist, like a road tourer, is acutely aware of the public's image of him so a good image is important," he said.

Advertising and public relations campaigns by dealers have helped motorcycles shed their negative image, according to Joe Sexton, owner of Manhattan Kawasaki.

"By introducing motorcycles to acceptable people they're no longer as intimidating," Sexton said. "The production of quieter cycles has helped, too."

THE INCREASED popularity of motorcycles has made them big business and hence more and larger dealers have entered the market.

Verle Harrison, manager of Overseas Motorsport, Inc., said larger dealerships have helped make motorcycles more respectable.

"Cycle dealerships are considered respectable businesses now so that has certainly helped the image of the riders," Harrison said. "Since the number of riders has increased, the percentage of bad-image riders is growing smaller."

Motorcycling is safer than it used to be because cars are more aware of cycles on the road, according to Harrison. He estimated 75 per cent of all motorcycle accidents are caused by automobiles.

KANSAS state law no longer requires motorcycle riders to wear helmets but Sexton said 75 per cent of the riders still wear them.

According to Harrison, "very seldom do we sell a bike to new riders that don't buy a helmet."

Current trends are toward street and touring motorcycles. Koontz said cyclists are working with environmentalists but dirt riders are running out of land to ride on.

Several moto-cross tracks around the state have closed in the last few years and the Knobby Hills track in Olsburg is scheduled to close next year.

Off-road cycling is also more expensive than street riding, Koontz said.

LAST YEAR, of the 147,000 motorcycles sold in the United States, the majority of them were middleweight street cycles of 350 to 500 cc's.

"Middleweights are more affordable," Sexton said. "The trend is away from dirt bikes because of environmental reasons and because the average age of the motorcycle rider is going up."

"More people are riding cycles to work and on trips because of the low gas mileage, availability of parking and the improved technology making them smoother, quieter and more stylish," Koontz said.

All dealers interviewed agreed the gas shortage had a positive affect on the motorcycle business.

A typical middleweight cycle averages 50 miles per gallon and the smaller engines average even better.

"Even though cycles are economical, there is a limited market of buyers," Sexton said. "Most people (concerned about gas economy) will buy a smaller car rather than a motorcycle."

Program assists pregnant teenagers

By NANCY DENNING
Collegian Reporter

Susie S. is 17 years old. Last year she was a cheerleader, actively involved in a number of activities both in school and her community — a "model" teenager as one of her teachers described her. This year she is pregnant.

Linda D. is 11 years old. Last year she participated in graduation ceremonies with her sixth grade class. This year she is pregnant.

Statistics on teenage pregnancies are staggering.

"Of the total live births in Kansas in 1976, 17 per cent were to girls 19 and under," said Charles Crevoiserat, spokesman for the Bureau of Registration and Statistics in Topeka.

"Abortions given to women under 19 years old constituted 42 per cent of the total statewide," Crevoiserat said.

"In 1976, Riley County reported 162 births by girls between the ages of 15 and 19. None were reported for the age group between 10 and 14. The 162 live births constitute 16 per cent of the total live births in Riley County," Crevoiserat said.

"Riley County provides a family planning group for girls of all ages," said Bill Deam, administrator of the Riley County Health Department (RCHD).

"We (RCHD) provide information, an examination and contraceptive devices to the clientele in the area," Deam said. "The average age is between 19 and 22, but we see them younger and of course older."

THE COST is minimal. "We (RCHD) try to charge a minimum fee of $10. This includes a six month supply of birth control pills, a PAP test and a physical by a physician. This charge doesn't stand in the way of letting a girl get help if she needs it," Deam said.

The family planning program works on a one-to-one basis, Deam said. There are four registered nurses and one Licensed Practical Nurse.

"If the girl is a minor the parents have to be notified," Deam said. "A nurse will talk to the girl and convince her she can't handle the problem alone. The nurse will even go with her to her parents if necessary."

"It takes a lot of personal perseverance on the nurse's part to have to tell these kids that they have to tell their mothers and if they are going to be sexually active they must use some kind of contraceptive devices," Deam said.

THE CONCERN of the RCHD is to see those people who need birth control information and birth control contraceptive devices get them.

"Our (RCHD) program is strictly confidential. The program is geared toward the youngsters. We don't want to scare them away," Deam said. "We try to create an environment in which the younger group feels important. There is no scolding or moral talks."

"The majority of girls that we (K-State Pregnancy Counseling) see are in their late teens," said Linda Teener, director of pregnancy counseling at K-State. "Our program helps the girls explore the alternatives," Teener said.

THE ALTERNATIVES include adoption, abortion, single parenthood and marriage.

"The trend is toward abortions," Teener said.

If the abortion is done in a clinic the cost is $175. If performed by a doctor the cost increases to $600 or $700.

"We (pregnancy counseling) have each girl fill out a follow-up form," Teener said. "It is not possible to actively follow-up every case. For some women abortion is a hard decision for them in the first place and once they have an abortion they would just as soon forget about it. If they get good counseling before the abortion the after psychological effects are minimal."

"When I do see a teenager pregnant, I don't put them in a corner and try to counsel them," Dr. Rex Fisher, obstetrician and gynecologist said. "Most of them pretty much have their minds made-up as to what they are going to do."

THE MOST frequently chosen option for teenagers is abortions, however, Congress recently passed a bill denying the use of public money for abortions.

"I think abortions will be modified with this action," Dr. Bill Tiemann, family practitioner, said. "There will be more babies born who will be on welfare."

"The solution to teenage pregnancies is found in sex education for parents. I think it is terrible that in our community there is not more education for the parents," Deam said.

With all the salacious magazines and shows available to kids these days it is tougher for them to stay out of trouble, according to J. Lester Hooper, seventh grade Manhattan Junior High School counselor.

"Sex education alone is not the answer to the problem. Look at all the material on the market on the hazards of drinking and smoking and yet there is a higher number of alcoholics and more people smoking than ever."

"Along with education there has to be a moral background. Teenage pregnancies will not be slowed down with just education," he said. "Parents must instill responsibility into their children."

Waterbed used for horses at Dykstra

Dykstra Veterinary Clinic is keeping right with the times. It recently acquired a waterbed for horses.

The waterbed is used to cushion horses during surgery.

"The horse actually floats on it," said Jack Easley, Dykstra veterinarian. With an average mature horse weighing 900 to 1,200 pounds, a long operation with the animal lying in the same position can put stress on the circulatory and muscular systems.

Such a pad is used to cushion the muscles and nerve pressure points, thus preventing paralysis, Easley said.

The $78 waterbed was purchased from the Land and Sky Company of Lincoln, Neb. It is especially designed for equine surgery use and is guaranteed to hold up to 2000 pounds.

The "bed" was put into use about a week-and-a-half ago and has been used successfully in more than eight operations, according to Easley.

Although the waterbeds-for-horses idea did not originate at K-State, it is a fairly new concept, Easley said.

Engineer says grades are over-emphasized

By TOM FAULKNER
Collegian Reporter

A K-State graduate has been appointed superintendent of operations in the Emporia Division of Kansas Power and Light.

Bedford Magnus, 1950 graduate in electrical engineering, took over the position July 18.

According to Magnus, engineering students should not spend all their time studying.

"Engineering students need to learn how to work with people," Magnus said. "Students can not take great loads of school work and find time to be active."

PEOPLE dwell on grades and then they get thrust into industry and fail because they are not able to correspond with others and, according to Magnus, it is at that time engineers find fundamentals and science are minimal.

"Engineers need to be sensitive to people's needs," Magnus said.

"People don't understand technical problems."

Being an engineer for a utility offers many challenging opportunities to work with people and the public, according to Magnus.

"We are living now in a period of our history of great challenge for all engineers in the utility industry," Magnus said.

Such concerns are the environment problems, depleting gas and oil supplies and the need to develop alternative fuel sources.

According to Magnus, career opportunities are available for engineers working for utilities.

"A majority of jobs lead to management job positions for those that can work with people," Magnus said. "The utility industry needs engineers seeking a challenge and a desire to solve problems."

Egypt denies Libyan reports of continued fighting in desert

CAIRO (AP)—Egypt declared Monday that a cease-fire ordered by President Anwar Sadat in the Egyptian-Libyan feud was holding firm and denied a Libyan report of continued fighting at a desert oasis.

"No military operations took place inside Libyan territory or on the Egyptian-Libyan border after the cease-fire went into effect at 9 p.m. Sunday," a military spokesman in Cairo said. "Our forces are strictly observing the cease-fire order."

In Rome, Libyan Ambassador Kadri El Atrash told a news conference fighting was still going on at the Al Kufra oasis, nearly 100 miles inside Libya, with Egyptian paratroopers trying to occupy the area.

He also said Libyan forces routed Egyptian paratroopers from the Al Jaghub oasis, capturing some and sending the others fleeing into the desert. Al Jaghub is 20 miles inside Libya.

Cairo radio said Sunday night that all Egyptian forces withdrew from Libyan soil after Sadat ordered an immediate end to hostilities.

The Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) announced in Cairo on Monday that the shuttle diplomacy of PLO leader Yasir Arafat resulted in a three-point cease-fire agreement agreed to by both sides. No details were announced.

Reporters have been barred from the 800-mile-long desert frontier since fighting erupted six days ago. There has been no independent confirmation of conflicting claims about the fighting issued by Libya and Egypt.

The Libyan ambassador in Rome said there could be no cease-fire until Algerian President Houari Boumedienne, who has been acting as mediator along with Arafat, reports back to Libyan leader Col. Moamar Khadafy. Boumedienne visited first Tripoli, then Egypt in his mediation attempt. He left Egypt for Tripoli on Monday.

The ambassador said Egyptian military actions against Libya were timed to disrupt any Arab attempt to form a joint front against the new Israeli government of Prime Minister Menachem Begin.

"Egypt," he said, "acted to prevent the summit because it might have meant something new in relation to the situation following the Israeli elections."

The Libyan diplomat said victims of Egyptian raids included citizens of various nationalities working in Libya. But he said "it was difficult to be precise about the various nationalities and the names among the many victims of the bombings at this time."

The ambassador ruled out any reprisal against the 200,000 Egyptians who live and work in oil-rich Libya. "The Libyan people will not do any harm to them in any way. No security measures will be needed to ensure their safety," he said.

South Korea agrees to U.S. joint command

SEOUL, South Korea (AP)—The United States and South Korea agreed Monday to set up a joint military command that would give the Seoul government control over movement of its 600,000-man army for the first time since the Korean War.

The agreement was reached in the first day of talks between U.S. Defense Secretary Harold Brown and South Korean Defense Minister Suh Jyong-chul on President Carter's plan to withdraw 33,000 American ground troops from this peninsula by 1981 or 1982.

Brown also met for two hours Monday with South Korean President Park Chung-hee. The defense secretary gave him a letter from Carter, assuring Park that the pullout does not signify "any change whatsoever in our commitment to the security of the Republic of Korea."

"Our determination to provide prompt support to help the Republic of Korea defend against armed attack, in accordance with the U.S.-Korean mutual defense treaty, remains firm and undiminished," said the Carter letter, dated July 21 and released by Park's office.

Despite Carter's assurances, South Korean leaders continue to express worry whether the pullout will leave them vulnerable to attack from Communist North Korea.

The combined command, to be set up in about one year, will end the absolute operational control over the South Korean army granted to the United States 27 years ago by then-President Syngman Rhee.

A South Korean will be deputy commander of the combined force, to be headed by the senior American officer here. Currently, he is Lt. Gen. John Vessey Jr., who in his second job as commander of U.N. forces represents the United Nations at armistice talks with North Korea.

The only U.N. forces left in Korea are those of the United States, and they are to be reduced almost to nothing within five years.

THE COMBINED command is one of several concessions to South Korea, intended to sweeten the bitter pill of withdrawal. Other planned U.S. concessions include $1.4 billion in military credits at 8 per cent interest a year for 12 years, and a gift of $500 million in military equipment to be left in Korea by the departing troops.

Congress must approve both credits and gifts.

Informed sources said Defense Minister Suh opened the first session with Brown by reading a statement reiterating South Korea's desire to have the U.S. troops remain, but agreeing to accept the withdrawal if compensation were made.

Suh then said: "Our desire is to realize the compensatory measures first, then withdrawal."

The ground troop pullout, which will leave American Navy and Air Force units in place here, was criticized by both the South Korean government and opposition parties and was a subject of dispute within the U.S. military command itself. Opponents say the pullout is likely to encourage the North to stage another invasion, as it did in 1950 to trigger the three-year Korean conflict.

Senators say he was 'smeared'

Lance denies wrongdoing

WASHINGTON (AP)—Budget director Bert Lance denied under oath Monday any wrongdoing in connection with his purchase of stock in the Atlanta bank he once headed. Senators who questioned him about it said he has been "smeared."

Lance appeared before the Senate Governmental Operations Committee, as his trustee in Atlanta made it known that Lance's 200,000 shares in the National Bank of Georgia, now held in a blind trust, may be sold as early as Wednesday.

That step would relieve Lance of his most pressing problem: The need to avoid any appearance of a conflict of interest between his bank stock and his government duties.

The Atlanta Constitution reported in Tuesday's editions that Lance's NBG stock would be sold to David Smith, 39, of Atlanta. Smith could not be reached immediately for comment.

A SPOKESMAN for Smith, Henry Woodbridge of Pomfret, Conn., said to his knowledge "no deal has been made" between Smith and Lance.

Smith's company, International Horizons, specializes in production of English language learning courses for non-Americans, and recently expanded into the biorhythm industry.

International Horizons reported $25 million in sales last year.

Lance had asked for an extension of the Dec. 31 deadline by which he had promised to sell the stock. Sen. Abraham Ribicoff, D-Conn., chairman of the committee, said he would wait to see whether or not the sale goes through.

After hearing Lance's explanation, the committee called off any further investigation of its own.

At the White House, Deputy Press Secretary Rex Granum said President Carter "does hope that all the facts will be brought out" about Lance's financial position and that he retains "full confidence" in Lance.

All senators who questioned Lance expressed satisfaction at his explanations. But the U.S. Comptroller of the Currency still has to report on an inquiry into a $3.4 million loan Lance obtained from a Chicago bank with which the National Bank of Georgia had deposited a non-interest-bearing $50,000 "correspondent" account.

LANCE said the account has not been dormant, as had been alleged, but has fluctuated from a low of $37,000 last winter to a high of about $200,000 in the period after he left the Georgia bank.

Committee members did indicate they will take a close look at the eventual purchaser of Lance's stock to make sure that the purchase does not constitute a potential conflict of interest.

But the senators were virtually unanimous in telling Lance they believe his explanations under oath have "cleared the air" and restored his "presumption of innocence."

Lance's appearance was prompted by recent newspaper allegations concerning his financial dealing before entering the Carter administration as director of the Office of Management and Budget.

Ribicoff told Lance that based on the evidence so far, he believes those allegations are unwarranted.

Park maintenance not a high priority

Manhattan Mayor Russell Reitz will ask the city commission this week for a mill to be added to Manhattan's city budget. The money, Reitz has said, will be used to upgrade local parks.

The extra money collected and used for park improvement will total about $76,000. Reitz proposes to use the money, not for additional parks or the construction of another swimming pool or more tennis courts, but for the maintenance of the existing parks.

The money will be used to hire professional and semi-professional persons to care for the flora of Manhattan's parks.

It seems incongruous that the upkeep of the parks should cost taxpayers so much money.

WHILE it can't be denied that our city parks should look good, why not use that kind of money for more worthwhile projects?

For example, the heavy rains in May and June caused extensive flooding in parts of Manhattan, demonstrating the need for more adequate water removal systems. The money Reitz is asking for could be used to begin some improvements.

The amount of money Reitz is asking for may not be enough to build new tennis courts or another swimming pool, but these projects are worthy of consideration.

Tied into his proposal, Reitz has suggested the elimination of fee collection at the Municipal Pool. The income from the pool totals about $11,000 a year. Subtracting this amount from the total which could be collected would leave $65,000 for park maintenance.

This proposal may look good on paper, but there are other needed improvements which could be made with the money rather than using it to provide flowers in city parks for the short summer months.

All cats are not finicky

Shakespeare II wants all you animalists out there to know he doesn't appreciate the unforgivable discrimination with which people have tried to degrade him all his life.

That's right. I'm taking up for another group which society has a habit of suppressing.

I must. This time it involves a man I love very much.

Shakespeare, or Shakey as I sometimes call him, has the most beautiful almond-shaped blue eyes imaginable. He is very quiet, arrogant, regal and at times a royal pain. Oh, I suppose you might find it of interest to know he is a foreigner. From Thailand, to be exact. From Siam, to be more exact.

He's mostly white. That, combined with his silver markings, combine into one of the handsomest blue-point Siamese cats you'll ever see.

DESPITE all these looks and utter class, he has to put up with animalist remarks and the stereotypes of the old cat tales, no pun intended.

Probably the worst are the dancing "chow, chow, chow" cats of television advertising. Shakespeare can tell you cats don't dance in such a manner.

He gets upset when he sees his sisters and brothers put through the animated motions of an adapted fox trot. (Please excuse the terminology, foxes of the world.)

Then there's the belief all cats are finicky eaters. In reality, they are no more collectively finicky and varied in tastes than humans. Some cats may be finicky, some may eat anything.

The assumption cats share a common sound, "meow," is false. Shakespeare will attest to the fact that voices are individualistic. Shakespeare neither meows or phsssssst. My family lives with four cats, all of whom speak in different voices.

ANOTHER WINNER many humans seem hung up on is the notion cats will suck a baby's breath. I beg to differ. The only kind of baby's breath Shakespeare would have in or near his mouth is the tiny flowers of that name. Some of his best friends are tots.

Besides, even if he did do it, some of us couldn't say much. We tie stones around cat babies and throw them in the river. And that's no tale.

Lastly, Shakespeare would like me to dispell the rumor that cats and dogs don't get along. It is the human race which has separated the two and socialized them to be incompatible. We have a habit of trying to separate groups with different characteristics, most of which are superficial.

My family's cats are our friends and companions, just as varied in personalities, likes and dislikes as the human race. Something about them which is unlike personkind, however, is their faithfulness. They don't steal, murder, lie or let us down.

I know, I know. You're not to blame. Some of your best friends are cats, right?

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia—Albania has asked China to pull out its technical experts in a move that could lead to a break in the 16-year-old alliance between a giant and a midget of the Communist world, diplomatic sources said Monday.

The Albanian regime of Enver Hoxha made the request through the Chinese Embassy in Tirana sometime last week following the withdrawal of some 50 Albanian students from Chinese universities, foreign diplomats in neighboring Yugoslavia said.

Worsening of relations between China and Albania became public July 8 when the Albanian Communist party paper attacked the Chinese. Although not mentioned by name, China was denounced for its rapprochement with the United States and for failing to keep its Marxist-Leninist ideology pure.

OAKLAND—Three young men accused of the bizarre mass kidnapping of a busload of Chowchilla school children and their driver abruptly pleaded guilty to 27 counts of kidnap for ransom Monday, but said they would stand trial on five more serious charges.

In exchange for the guilty pleas, prosecutors dropped 18 counts of armed robbery covering personal items taken from the young kidnap victims.

The three—Frederick Woods, 25, James Schoenfeld, 25, and his brother, Richard Schoenfeld, 24, retained their innocent pleas to five counts of kidnap with bodily harm, a charge that could mean a maximum sentence of life in prison without possibility of parole upon conviction.

WASHINGTON—The Justice Department intends to seek indictments against five present or former congressmen in connection with the South Korean influence-buying scandal, Speaker Thomas O'Neill and his aides said Monday.

Aides said O'Neill, other House leaders and the House ethics committee were notified last week that two persons will be indicted next month and three in September.

The speaker said he was given no names and did not know whether any of the persons to be indicted are still in Congress.

Buying food for singles creates problems

By MARY LOU PETER
Collegian Reporter

A single person living alone often has trouble buying food economically and waste-free.

Certain cuts of meat are often too large for one serving. The most popular sizes of canned foods also contain more than one serving.

Single-serving sizes in canned and frozen foods are generally more expensive than the larger-volume sizes. A check at a local grocery store revealed the 10-ounce size of Top Frost frozen corn selling for 35 cents while the 20-ounce size was priced at 63 cents. The seven-ounce can of Green Giant Niblets corn sells for 27 cents while the 12-ounce size goes for 41 cents. Stokely french-style green beans (canned) is priced at 23 cents for eight ounces and 39 cents for 16 ounces. In most cases, larger quantities mean better bargains.

WHEN BUYING meat, one should cut and wrap it into individual serving sizes before freezing it, said Doris Phillips, assistant professor of foods and nutrition. This is also true of chicken, round steak and any other cuts of meat too large for one serving.

Phillips also suggested keeping dried foods on hand, such as non-fat dry milk and powdered beverages. One can mix up as much as they need at any time without worrying about the beverage going sour.

Leftovers can be made into home-made TV dinners, Phillips said. Most foods freeze well, she said, except potatoes and foods containing egg-whites.

FRESH vegetables may be bought (usually less expensive than frozen or canned) and frozen loosely on cookie sheets. This helps keep them easily pourable when packaged later. Such side vegetables as mushrooms and onions work well for this, Phillips said.

The United States Department of Agriculture (USDA) puts out a pamphlet, Food Guide for Older Folks, which contains several tips for the person who lives alone.

It explains that, although partially or fully-prepared foods usually cost more than those prepared at home, in some recipes so much food must be purchased that unused portions make cooking with unprepared foods impractical.

For example if a pound cake recipe calls for one cup of buttermilk and the smallest container buttermilk comes in is one quart, it is often more economical to go to the grocery bakery section for the smaller portion.

The pamphlet also suggests using baby and junior foods in recipes that call for small amounts of a vegetable or fruit.

Such foods usually come in smaller and less-expensive containers. Other suggestions are using leftover meat in casseroles (which can be frozen), salads, sandwiches, soups and as a flavoring for cooked vegetables.

PLANNING ahead and making a grocery list and itemizing only necessary foods can help eliminate over-buying and waste. It isn't a good idea to make a trip to the grocery store when hungry.

Keeping boxed mixes, such as macaroni and cheese and spaghetti will help handle an unexpected guest, Phillip said.

Other tips for the single person may be obtained from the USDA pamphlet "Your Money's Worth in Foods." It suggests using eggs, dry beans, dry peas and peanut butter in place of meat for low cost and variety in meals. They are usually as good, if not better, buys and keep longer than the less-expensive cuts of meats. They also provide protein and similar nutrients that meat provides.

Carter promises programs for poor

WASHINGTON (AP)—President Carter, in an aggressive defense of his domestic policies, promised the National Urban League on Monday that a "flood of new programs" to help the nation's poor will emerge from his administration.

Ticking off a list of job-creating programs he has supported during his first six months in office, Carter declared, "We're committed to the poor, the hungry, the timid, the weak, and the unemployed."

THE LEAGUE'S director, Vernon Jordan, had charged on Sunday, "many black people feel that their hopes and their needs have been betrayed" by Carter.

"A flood of new programs will be coming to your communities in the coming weeks and months," said Carter, explaining, "It takes time to change the trend of history and reverse the bureaucratic mechanisms."

Carter recalled the joke about a fellow arrested for getting drunk and setting a bed on fire.

"When he got before the judge, he said, 'I plead guilty to being drunk, but the bed was on fire when I got in it.'"

"Well, to some degree the bed was on fire when I got in it," the President said.

Riley County Fair to feature rodeo

The second annual Kaw Valley Rodeo will be held Aug. 1, 2 and 3 in conjunction with the Riley County Fair. The event is sponsored by the Kaw Valley Rodeo Association and will begin at 8 p.m. nightly.

Competition in bull-riding, bareback and saddle bronc riding will be featured.

The rodeo is sanctioned by the Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association (PRCA) and the Girl's Rodeo Association (GRA).

ABOUT 5000 seats were available at last year's rodeo, according to Bob Brummett, president of the Kaw Valley rodeo organization. An additional 1000 seats have been added for this year's rodeo, he said.

A kids' calf scramble will be held during each performance. Children from the audience may come into the arena and attempt to be the first to get a rope around a calf's neck. A leather belt buckle will be awarded to the winner each night.

Monday night the scramble will be for 11 and 12-year-olds, with Tuesday night for 9 and 10-year olds and Wednesday for 7 and 8-year-olds.

Representatives from KMAN and KMKF radio stations will compete against each other in a bullriding competition nightly.

Reserved seat tickets are available for $3 each. Other reserved tickets and general admission are $2.50.

Artificial breeding aids beef industry

By MARY LOU PETER

Collegian Reporter

The field of artificial insemination (AI) has been a boon to the cattle industry in the United States.

The Kansas Artificial Breeding Service Unit (KABSU) deals with every imaginable facet of the field, with the idea of service as the number one priority.

"It's first of all a service organization and that's what we need to provide," said Charles Michaels, KABSU manager. "We offer a custom service for privately-owned bulls which includes collection, housing (of bulls), semen storage and shipping."

The organization will also handle the considerable amount of paperwork involved for those buying or selling semen.

The unit owns about 40 beef and dairy bulls. At the height of the breeding season, about 70 bulls are housed at KABSU, the extra 30 are privately-owned.

ADVANTAGES of AI include more extensive use of proven genetically superior sires, greater flexibility in herd breeding programs (i.e., more different bulls can be used) and it permits continued use of bulls after their semen productive life has ended. Also the frozen semen, properly handled and used in a healthy herd, can reduce the risk of a decreased calf crop and it eliminates the danger and expense of keeping a bull on the farm.

KABSU is the only AI facility still operating in connection with a land-grant university that is self-supporting, according to Michaels. In 1949, when established, the Kansas legislature appropriated $35,000 for KABSU. The College of Agriculture added another $10,000 but since then there have been no further subsidies for KABSU. It is sustained solely from income derived from service.

The unit was organized strictly for dairy but in 1959 beef semen became available through the facility.

ALTHOUGH the goal is to serve Kansas cattlemen, KABSU does deal with other "studs" (semen distribution centers) and individual cattle breeders throughout the United States and world.

Most of the bulls housed at KABSU live in well-ventilated barns. A chosen few are allowed to live in climate-controlled stalls where an effort is made to keep the temperature about 60 degrees.

Hot weather affects semen production adversely in about 90 per cent of the bulls, Michaels said. Those living in the air-conditioned stalls are already proven or very promising younger bulls and may be either KABSU's or privately-owned.

A common sight while driving past KABSU at College Ave. and Claflin Rd. is many bulls outside the barns. An effort is made to give them a change of environment as often as possible.

"The mental attitude on these guys is terribly important," Michaels said.

AFTER THEIR semen is collected, it is frozen in liquid nitrogen (-320 degrees). In this state it can be stored for an indefinite period. The actual amount of time semen can remain frozen and still be usable has not been determined, as the concept is relatively new. It is possible that it will remain effective up to 30 years and maybe longer, according to Michaels.

The semen is packaged in ampules, straws or pipettes, each unit containing enough frozen semen to inseminate one cow. The units have a complete identification system, indicating the breed and the precise bull used.

When someone desires to buy semen from a particular bull, KABSU packs it and ships by bus.

"We can get shipment anywhere in the United States within two days," Michaels said.

If the semen is being exported to a foreign country it is usually sent by air.

The facility is also the site of AI training schools. For those cattlemen who desire to learn AI procedures, KABSU offers a do-it-yourself program about once a month from November through April.

HOLSTEINS are by far the most popular dairy breed requested, Michaels said. KABSU offers semen for sale from many Holsteins with the price per unit ranging from $2 to $20.

Other dairy breeds represented are Ayrshire, Guernsey, Jersey, Brown Swiss and Milking Shorthorns.

A variety of beef breeds are represented. They include Angus, Red Angus, Charolais, Horned Hereford, polled Hereford and polled Shorthorn. Others are Santa Gertrudis, Red Poll, Brahman, Welsh Black and Devon.

With exotic breeds playing an important part in today's beef programs, KABSU also offers Simmental, Maine-Anjou, Chianina and Limousin semen. Other lesser-known breeds are also available.

Although cattle are the main species in which AI is used, Michaels said there may soon be a breakthrough in the field of swine AI.

K-State to host workshop on energy

By EDMUND EJEKAM

Collegian Reporter

K-State will host a week-long workshop on energy conducted by the Department of Nuclear Engineering from Aug. 1 through 5.

The workshop, Perspectives in Energy, is designed to educate the public on all aspects of the energy situation with special attention to the Great Plains.

Sponsorship is by a grant from the United States Energy Research and Development Administration.

According to Ken Shultis, professor of nuclear engineering and director of the workshop, many people have a myopic view of the energy situation.

"Too many people do not try to do the intellectual thing of looking at both sides of the story," Shultis said. "The energy issue is a complex one with social and political sides to it, both nationally and internationally."

"We want to get the public interested in the many intricacies of the energy dilemma," he said.

A MAXIMUM of 30 people will attend the workshop. Participants will be high school or junior college teachers. They are required to hold a bachelor's degree from an accredited institution.

Shultis said the long-range plan is to educate the teachers on the energy problem. The teachers, in turn, will educate their students so they will understand what they will have to deal with in the future.

"We will have people from all backgrounds to enrich the seminar atmosphere. The energy crisis is not something you can relegate to only certain fields," Shultis said.

The workshop will consist of lectures, discussions, recitation periods, a reactor tour and a classroom research unit. The material presented will be on the graduate level.

PARTICIPANTS may earn up to two graduate hours in the program. Those who desire credit have to apply for admission to the Graduate School before enrolling in the workshop. Fees will be required for the credit hours.

Commenting on alternate energy sources, Shultis said solar energy is a possible source of energy today. The drawback is it cannot be used to operate appliances economically.

"Nuclear energy is a very feasible solution to the energy problem but it's up to the people to decide if they need it," he said.

SEVERAL YEARS ago there was controversy about a proposal to create a nuclear waste repository in Kansas. At present, some nuclear power plants are planned or are already under construction in Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska and Oklahoma.

Shultis said hydroelectricity is also a good energy source.

"But we have dammed about 25 per cent of the feasible hydroelectric sites and yet hydroelectricity contributes to only about four per cent of the nation's energy supply," he said. "It is a viable source of energy unless you are the farmer who loses his farm to a site."

Shultis said no single energy source is the only answer to the problem. For each source the costs and benefits have to be weighed before it is instituted. Each method has its advantages and disadvantages.

Dean Eckhoff, professor of nuclear engineering and director of the K-State Center for Energy Studies, is co-director of the workshop. James Hamilton, assistant professor of philosophy, and Thomas Lester, assistant professor of chemical engineering, will also assist at the workshop.

K-State computer shutdown inhibits research, instruction

By BARBARA RUST

Collegian Reporter

The computer at the K-State Computing Center stopped at 12:30 a.m. last Sunday and wasn't functioning again until 7 p.m. Tuesday.

"This is the longest time in three years that the machine has been down," said Tom Gallagher, director of the Computing Center. "In fact, this is the longest total time span that it has ever been down before."

The power supplies failed. By 6 p.m. Monday, the correct parts were added, but power sequencing had to be balanced.

The center has had the machine, an IBM 370 model 158, for three years. The computer is used for research and instruction by students and faculty.

"Research and instruction were inhibited," Gallagher said. "We are fortunate it occurred at this time and not the end of a semester."

REMOTE users including Winfield College, Johnson County Community College, Emporia State University and Marymount College were also inconvenienced. People at these locations have constant access to the computer. These remote systems have access to K-State's Computing Center from high-speed telephone lines. In this way, places which can't afford a computer can get service.

"This computer has been just unbelievably reliable," Gallagher said. "We have never had total failure of service for more than an hour before. It is not uncommon for a computer of this type to stop on an average of once a month."

The most common mechanical problems are dirt on a tape drive, failure of a part, a loose bolt or poor electrical contact.

"We pay to have the machine maintained from 7 a.m. to 11 p.m.," he said. "If this (computer stoppage) happened at the end of a semester, we would have reacted faster, but we would have to pay extra for it."

THE CENTER pays a service charge to IBM to maintain the computer. If the machine stops after 11 p.m., however, the center can either wait until 7 a.m. or pay extra for the service call.

The IBM service maintenance cost $30,000 per year, but 24-hour service would cost about $12,000 more. Gallagher doesn't think the additional money would help.

"We do something that is relatively unique," he said. "The computer runs continually by itself from midnight until 6:30 a.m."

FOR PREVENTIVE maintenance, the computer is cleaned and dusted weekly. The tape and disc drives are cleaned daily. IBM personnel come twice each week to inspect the machine.

"They (IBM personnel) run special programs which attempt to locate any electronic malfunction," Gallagher said.

Excluding tests using computer cards, more than 4,000 different people at K-State use the computer yearly. More than 300,000 programs went through the computer last fiscal year and Gallagher predicts an increase of 15 to 20 per cent for next fiscal year.

"In all curricula, students in their freshman and sophomore year are being introduced to the computer," Gallagher said. "They will use this as a research tool throughout their college years."

Workers accuse groundskeeper of facility misuse

By DENNIS BOONE
Collegian Reporter

Allegations of illegal use of University property and facilities and mismanagement in the operation of the grounds department by Thomas Shackelford, superintendent of grounds were greeted by Shackelford last night with surprise, but without denial. Shackelford, after being informed of charges of his alleged misuse of facilities and labor, as well as the accusations of mismanagement, said that as far as he knew, there was no substantive evidence supporting the charges. He also indicated he felt the allegations were blown out of proportion.

The alleged wrongdoings surfaced Monday night when Greg Lorie, a junior in architecture, and another student working on the grounds crew who asked to remain unidentified, told the Collegian Shackelford had state employees doing work unrelated to University grounds keeping in at least four cases. These examples were:

Shackelford's son's car was repaired by the chief mechanic of the grounds crew at no charge; the use of female employees on the gardening detail to harvest vegetables in Shackelford's personal garden for his use at home; practice sessions held on University time for the little league baseball team Shackelford coaches and the use of ground crew manpower to move an automatic baseball throwing machine to those grounds during University working hours.

OTHER grievances voiced by Lorie and his co-worker included:

The overall appearance of the campus, with a dangerous number of dead limbs still in the trees; the installation of flower beds on the south sides of Cardwell and Denison Halls which the two claim cannot flourish in the extreme heat and sunlight to which they are exposed; the waste of labor arising from an "expedition" to cut a certain weed from a field on the north end of campus, only to have the entire field machine-mowed the following day, and in general, the lack of judgment as to which areas of the campus should receive the most attention in groundskeeping.

"The whole thing is divided into two problems, really," said the unidentified student. "First, there are those activities which border on being downright criminal—the use of University property and labor for non-job related projects—and those which are a matter of just poor judgment and mismanagement."

Lorie cited as specific examples of the alleged misjudgment the large numbers of weeds growing out of control near the Union parking lot, and grass growing back over the flower beds dug at Cardwell as a result of neglect. The beds required a second digging at an approximated labor cost of $800 to $1,000.

IN ANSWERING each charge, Shackelford maintained his innocence of any wrongdoing.

"As far as the thing with the mechanic and my son's car, yes, it was in the garage. I had asked him (the mechanic) if he could look at it and tell him whether it needed a new clutch installed. It was purely an advisory thing, no work was actually done to repair the car. My son brought down a pressure plate to have the guy look at, and he said replacement would not be necessary," Shackelford said.

As far as charges of misuse of labor for jobs unrelated to maintenance of the campus, Shackelford could not recall specific instances.

"Oh, boy. I am fairly certain the answer to that one is no," he said. "I at one time did have a partial garden growing until Chalmers Hall went in as Chalmers Hall, with some potatoes and onions growing there, but as far as having girls do the gardening for me, no, I can't remember that ever happening."

"As for the instance where we loaded the baseball machine, that is just a tennis-ball machine that I asked one boy to help me load on the scooter," Shackelford said. "It couldn't have weighed enough to be more than 50 pounds each. And I drove it out there and unloaded it at Meyers Field alone. That was just a few seconds to load it—like asking someone to borrow a pencil."

Shackelford admitted he con-

Brown pledges continued nuclear support to Korea

TOKYO (AP)—U.S. Defense Secretary Harold Brown pledged on Tuesday that the United States will continue to cover South Korea with its nuclear umbrella. Informed sources said a rear guard of up to 12,000 troops will remain to cover the withdrawal of 33,000 American ground forces.

According to the sources, a senior official aboard Brown's plane said Brown gave assurances that two brigades, roughly comprised of 8,000 combat troops and several thousand for logistic support, would remain until the very end of the phaseout in 1982. "We hadn't said no to the idea before," he said. "We left it open until the talks."

Brown flew to Tokyo on Tuesday to brief Japanese officials on his two days of talks with Korean leaders about the U.S. withdrawal plans. Before he left, he told a news conference in Seoul that South Korea "is and will continue to be protected by the U.S. nuclear umbrella."

But he added, "I think it is a mistake to depend on nuclear weapons when in this case non-nuclear weapons will suffice."

In addition, the United States proposed a $1.9 billion military credit and gift package to augment South Korea's $5 billion military modernization program.

Brown said withdrawal was designed to bring about "a more stable political situation." But he implied that if the situation changes by the final pullout date of 1982, the withdrawal could be halted.

The United States also pledged in a communique that it "would not enter any negotiations on the future of Korea with North Korea without the participation of the Republic of Korea."

The South Koreans were known to be uneasy about the phaseout of ground forces who have been there since the end of the Korean War in 1953, and its effect on the over-all deterrent strength.

Brown said South Korea's 600,000-man army backed by the two rear-guard brigades and U.S.

naval and air forces which are to remain in Korea will be able to cope with any threat from Communist North Korea.

Within a year or so, he said the United States and South Korea would form a combined military command to give Korea a greater say in the operation of its army, which has under control of an American general since 1950.

The most difficult part of the talks concerned working out a precise agreement that included a list of military hardware for South Korea. Both sides found this too complicated and instead roughed out a general agreement with details to be filled in later, sources said.

The senior official said the list of equipment to be left behind was a "temporary sticking point," adding it would most likely include some but not all helicopters and armored troop carriers, sources said.

K-State parking bothers city

By KEN MILLER
Managing Editor

The use of KSU Stadium and the possible elimination of all on-street parking near the K-State campus were discussed as possible solutions to the growing problem of off-campus parking at the Manhattan City Commission meeting last night, but it's not likely the issue will be resolved until sometime this fall.

Commissioners were confronted with the growing problem last spring when residents asked them to consider changes in the city's parking ordinances because what few parking spaces available to them are occupied by students who park off campus.

In last night's work session, the issue was again discussed, but City Planner Gary Stith said he could not make any recommendations on solutions to the problem until more studies are done and until the city had a chance to discuss the problem with University officials.

AS STITH explained it, the problem has been steadily worsening because more students are driving to school than ever before. He said part of the problem is transient parking, where students park as close to campus as possible and occupy parking spaces designed for residents.

Most of the problem, however, centers around a lack of storage parking, or those parking spaces designed for residents and K-State students who live on campus but cannot get residence hall parking permits.

It was suggested that the city manager and the city engineer meet with K-State President Duane Acker to discuss the problem.

Merle Schwab, a campus engineer with University Development, said the problem centers around the availability of off-campus parking which is free to the students, and the lack of on-campus parking, which students have to pay for.

"If we can make it so inconvenient to park on city streets and give them some incentive to park on campus, it will help," Schwab said.

STITH said the problems of enforcing the 48-hour off-campus parking regulation further complicates the problem. He said some sort of transit system would make it easier for students to park off-campus and remove illegal parking from off-campus streets. The planning department is currently working on a comprehensive city master plan which will incorporate some sort of mass transit recommendation.

Stith said the final solution to the parking problem would involve a combination of solutions and cooperation by University officials.

Utility increases raise Union fees

By BARBARA RUST
Collegian Reporter

Frequently students complain of cold temperatures in the K-State Union.

The Union isn't set at one uniform temperature. The staff tries to average the temperature at 76 degrees, but some rooms are set lower.

"I don't think we could have all the thermostats set the same," said Walt Smith, Union director.

The recreational area, for instance, could be cooler because physical activity increases body heat.

"Normally we don't cool the Forum Hall," he said. "We don't run it continually."

FORUM HALL is set at about 68 degrees to cool quickly. When people get chilled there, it's probably because the janitors didn't adjust the temperature once it was cool.

Last year the hallways were set at 75 degrees, but this year they are between 80 and 85 degrees.

"The temperatures are about the same as last year in the areas being used," Smith said. "The larger areas, like the concourse, we have increased. We've cut down our consumption (of energy) in the past three years mainly by putting automatic timers on air moving units, or vents and just basically controlling what electricity we can."

For the three weeks in August after summer school, thermostats will be set higher and air moving units will stop at 5 p.m.

WORK is being done to make air diffuse from vents instead of going vertically on the person sitting directly underneath.

"Ninety per cent of our units are off from 10 p.m. to 6 a.m.," Smith said. "On the fourth of July weekend, we shut everything off, but we can't do that when the recreation center is open."

In a letter sent to Smith, Case Bonebrake, director of Physical Plant, said the total energy used by the Union in 1976 was 151,000 btu's per square foot. The total campus averaged 244,000 btu's per square foot.

Two years ago, the Union began paying its utility costs, but the University paid previously.

"We are actually using less btu's than before," he said. "Two years ago we paid one and one-fourth cents per kilowatt hour and we are now at three cents per kilowatt hour. We pay what it cost the University."

FOR THE fiscal year, July 1, 1977, through June 30, 1978, Smith estimates a cost of $143,000 for utilities, a $60,000 increase from the previous year. Half the student fee increase for the Union will help pay utility costs. The $143,000 divides as follows:

$81,000 for electricity
$35,000 for air conditioning
$16,000 for steam
$11,000 for water and natural gas.

"Our electric bill is the biggest by far," Smith said. "We have to watch electric, air conditioning and steam utilities. If electricity keeps going up, we will have to take a critical look on the number of hours we stay open."

The students may have to decide if they are willing to pay more.

"I would hope we are doing a good enough job that students are willing to back us," he said.

A $5 per student per semester fee increase takes effect this fall.

A new fee, $6 per student per semester, will be for part-time students.

This will be the first time part-time students will have to pay this fee, he said. Because part-time students also use Union facilities, Smith believes this will be more equal for all students.

BEGINNING this fall, students will pay $23 each semester for the Union. From 1942 to 1956, students paid $5 each semester and didn't have a Union building. A $650,000 reserve was accumulated to build the Union.

From 1957 to 1967, students paid $12.50 per semester. In 1968, students paid $16. In 1975, when the Union started paying utilities, students paid $18 each semester.

"If I had to do it over again, I would have asked for a smaller amount (of an increase) earlier," Smith said. It's easier for students to adjust to a $2 increase instead of a $5 jump.

Grounds overseer accused of misusing facilities, labor ducted practices for his little league baseball team, but denied any serious offense involved in the matter.

"We might have had as many as seven practices," he said. "Most of the time, I stay around here (the Physical Plant) for as much as an hour extra each day, trying to visit with the crew, seeing how things are going with the operation. That's my own time, and I never look at a clock. I feel certain that I have made up any University time many, many, times over while I've spent my own time checking into the grounds operation."

In regard to the so-called mismanagement within the groundskeeping operation, Shackelford said the amount of work which must be done with limited manpower and finances makes it necessary to set priorities, with which anyone could disagree or find fault, depending upon his viewpoint.

"We have a list of 30 jobs or so that goes out every week with the foreman, Herman Wiard, who is in charge of keeping the grounds up. That includes doing the mowing, trimming limb stripping with his crew," Shackelford said. "Dead trees, yes, they are out there, but the ones that go first are those which pose an immediate threat to people, those which hang over sidewalks, parking lots and building entranceways."

Paul Young, vice-president of university development, emphasized Shackelford's problems, pointing out the dollar figure with which the grounds department must work.

"For the 1978-79 year we have asked for an increase of $255,180 over and above our 10 per cent annual budget increase," Young said. "It was denied. Our present budget is $254,788, so we were asking double the funding to fit the needs."

Young said an investigation of the charges may be authorized should the students report their grievances against the operation of the grounds department to university development, or should the case receive enough publicity to warrant an investigation.

CAIRO, Egypt—Egypt and Libya waged a war of words Tuesday, but Egypt said armed forces of the two Arab neighbors were observing a truce along their 700-mile desert frontier.

"Both sides are sincerely honoring the cease-fire," after a week of major border clashes, an Egyptian military spokesman told the Associated Press.

"The cease-fire will be in force as long as there are no Libyan military provocations," a Foreign Ministry spokesman said in denying that Egypt had laid down other conditions for the truce.

FAIRBANKS, Alaska—Explosions which authorities said were deliberately set blew away insulation on part of the Alaska pipeline about 15 miles north of here but did not interfere with the flow of oil.

About 30 to 40 feet of an above-ground section of the pipeline were damaged, Larry Talbert, state deputy commissioner of public safety, said Tuesday.

Talbert said wires, batteries and what appeared to be detonators were found near that section of the 800-mile pipeline operated by Alyeska Pipeline Service Co.

WASHINGTON—The public generally doesn't understand how the federal income tax system works and is convinced that the tax rates are unfair to most people, according to a new public opinion survey.

But the public is far more concerned about tax reforms that would reduce tax bills than about simplifying the tax process, according to the poll conducted by the Roper Organization.

"A good deal of the reason behind the indictment of the income tax system as 'unfair to most' appears to be gross misunderstanding of, and lack of information about, how the income tax system works," the Roper study said.

WASHINGTON—Housing and urban groups geared up Tuesday to convince the Carter administration again that welfare reform should not reduce payments to tenants of federally subsidized housing.

During the day, HEW Secretary Joseph Califano Jr. sent President Carter his 60-page final proposals for the $25-billion overhaul of welfare that the administration wants to unveil Aug. 4. Sources said reducing payments for such tenants was among three options to help finance the package.

Califano offered that option despite his assurance to a group of mayors, governors and county officials at a news conference last Wednesday that the idea "will not be part of the welfare reform program." He said the concept would be discussed later for possible inclusion in the fiscal 1979 budget.

Putting this option into welfare reform would mean that recipients living in subsidized housing would get smaller welfare payments than those in private housing. Critics fear this would result in thousands of units of subsidized housing being abandoned as former inhabitants moved to slum dwellings.

MIAMI—Cuban President Fidel Castro marked his revolution's birthday Tuesday night by telling a cheering crowd that it is "impossible to crush Cuba."

His two-hour address at Camaguey in east-central Cuba marked the 24th anniversary of the start of the revolution which led to the overthrow of dictator Fulgencio Batista.

"After all the imperialists' efforts to flatten us, it today is impossible to crush Cuba," he shouted.

Castro said Cuba intends to increase the number of doctors it has sent to Angola and also will send more physicians to Ethiopia.

Electrical safety in hospitals will be focus of conference

By MIKE NOEL
Collegian Reporter

Electrical safety will be the topic at the summer conference of the Kansas Hospital Engineers' Association.

The conference, sponsored by the Kansas Hospital Association and the Kansas Industrial Service, will be Friday in the Big Eight room of the Union. Richard Gallagher, associate professor of electrical engineering, is coordinator of the conference.

"There will be two types of individuals coming to the meeting: the engineers employed by hospitals in the state and safety managers of hospitals," Gallagher said.

Gallagher will open the conference with introductory comments on the overall importance of safety in hospitals. Following his opening talk, Stephen Richards, bioengineering intern in the Department of Electrical Engineering, will speak on the physiological aspects of macro and micro-shock.

GALLAGHER explained macro-shock as the process of passing the electrical current through the body and micro-shock as passing the current shock directly to the tissue in the body.

Richard Nalbert, manager of medical products for the Square D Company, will discuss electrical safety for critical patient areas. Nalbert will also talk on the recent changes in the national electrical code.

"He (Nalbert) will be bringing to this group some of the changes on the national electrical code as it applies to these hospital facilities when they go through their accreditation programs in the fall or spring," Gallagher said.

Harold Adamson, director of clinical engineering at the Wesley Medical Center in Wichita, will discuss examples of operational safety procedures for medical instrumentation.

MARK GUFFY, professor in the Department of Surgery and Medicine, will talk on the various radiological systems found in hospitals.

"What we're trying to do is point out to them some of the importances in looking at safety practices in the radiological arenas," Gallagher said.

The final presentation of the conference will feature Richards and Lionel D'Luna, another bioengineering intern in the Department of Electrical Engineering. They will give a demonstration on electrocardiogram monitoring equipment.

Solar houses topic of UFM discussion

The University for Man will offer a presentation on solar houses and energy-efficient homes at 7 p.m., Thursday at St. Paul's Episcopal Church basement.

Bruce Snead and Randy Pierce will lead the discussion. Both developed solar devices and energy savers shown at the Energy Fair last spring. These devices include window box heaters, fruit dryers and water heaters. The presentation will consist of a slide show of the devices developed and a discussion of how to make them. Snead and Pierce have been designing and constructing solar houses in the Manhattan area.

Nixon's ideas live

Richard Nixon's ideas about silencing the press are not dead. In 1973, after the devastating revelations of the Pentagon Papers and Watergate, Nixon urged Congress to pass an "Official Secrets Act," to muzzle the inquisitive press. The bill died in committee.

Now, rising like a phoenix, another bill, sponsored by Sens. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McClellan (D-Ark.), is directed toward shackling the press.

Among the proposals included in the bill are; conviction and jailing of news organization representatives and reporters who publish news articles or editorials in violation of a court-issued gag order, even though the gag-order may be illegal; publish news articles or editorials which "improperly attack," a government official, causing the official to lose his job; refuse to disclose a confidential news source pursuant to a court order, even if the court order is illegal; takes affirmative action to conceal the identity of a news source who may have committed a crime and those who publish a "stolen" government report, if the news organization or reporter derives any financial benefit from publication.

THE BILL is reminiscent of "1984," the book about the time when government controls people's minds. The freedom of the press is essential to the freedom of the individual.

The press is often dubbed the "fourth" branch of government. Its responsibility is to oversee government actions and to reveal any wrongdoings by government officials.

The passage of an "Official Secrets Act," would destroy the original intention of a free press. The only "news" which would be printed would be the "news" the government wanted the public to know.

That kind of "news" would, necessarily, not contain any substance. The public would be receiving the equivalent to corporation press releases.

Government officials would be protected so they could carry on in any manner they wished.

The freedom of the press is not an issue which concerns only journalists. It is an issue which concerns the future of democracy.

Requiem for a dream...

An eerie silence has been creeping over college campuses since 1974. The silence signals a new mood among college students; practicality.

In the late 1960s and early 70s, it was almost a sin to major in any subject which had a practical application. Students were "into" social awareness. The popular areas of study were sociology, English, anthropology, psychology and political science.

The popularity of these fields was due to the feeling of the time that whatever you were to accomplish with your life, your inner self must be relevant. Agriculture, engineering, architecture and veterinary medicine were simply not relevant to the issues of the day.

But, today, these fields are gaining in popularity, for those students who opted for relevant majors soon found themselves ineligible for good jobs in the "real" world.

ANTHROPOLOGY majors found the only work they were qualified for involved driving taxis around cities. Sociology majors were needed to grill hamburgers and psychology majors found their niche tending bar.

And the idealism which they harbored through college, their hope for changing the system was slowly corroded by the harsh truth that making a buck is the only sure means of putting food on the table.

Ideals die bitterly when confronted with reality. Reality was the one thing which was non-existent on college campuses at that time. Students existed in tightly-woven cocoons of security. Mom and Dad paid for their educations. Dormitories provided room and board. The only concerns of the individual were getting up on time for meals and doing laundry.

And so, they dreamed. They fashioned a world of complete justice and equality. They dreamed of the great changes they could instigate with their collective voices. The dream held and flourished. Until graduation.

THEN, the dreamers were facing the cold, cruel world with 8 to 5 workdays and two-week paid vacations. Dreams were relegated to hip pockets of polyester slacks.

Tackling the world was something college did not prepare them for. Or even warn them about. No one told them college was an ivory tower isolated from daily rat races.

But someone has told the students now in college. You no longer see the glint of idealism, the hope of bringing about change in their eyes. Instead, you witness the hardness which comes with realism. The coldness accompanying fierce competitiveness.

Students now are preparing themselves for the world. They do not plan to work outside the system, rather they seem content to work within the system. They have seen the dreams of their older brothers and sisters shattered and are determined not to succumb to the same disillusionment.

Most of all, they seem content with the way things are being managed. There is little need, now, for change.

But, it's sad to see the idealism fade from their eyes. It's almost frightening to watch how easily they accept the status quo. It's eerie to hear the astounding silence of unasked questions.

It's terrifying to think they may not care.

Operably viable longevity quotient?

The Census Bureau recently reported that little girl babies and little boy babies will live an average of three years longer than their 1970 counterparts. The average life expectancy for men soared to 72 years, while women can expect to live nine years longer, providing, of course, they're average.

That's all fine and good, but what our federal headcounters forgot to take into account in their latest presentation was what is called the Operably Viable Longevity Quotient. (OVLQ).

It's easy to toss averages and mean ages around, but not everyone is going to die at either 72 or 81, and this is what the OVLQ is all about. Because as soon as the little tot receives that first swat on the derriere, all sorts of things begin to affect how long he'll be around.

AN OBSCURE organization, The Society for the Determination of Life Expectancies, located in a Toledo, Ohio garage, has issued a list of things which might determine whether you'll make it to your respective life expectancy. Among them:

If you smoke, subtract 15 years from the average age. If you drink, subtract another 10 years.

If you smoke and drink, add 17 years to the year you were born to arrive at your average life expectancy.

Add eight months if you never went trick-or-treating on Halloween. You'll live an extra four years if you eat nothing but dietetic lettuce and K-State Union donuts for at least a year. But you lose those four years if you grew up in Topeka.

Those who sleep in an oxygen tent an expect to be around for at least 10 years longer than those who don't. And since the government recently discovered that X-rated movies cause cancer of the eyes, chop off a minimum of five months for each porno flick you've treated yourself to.

If you subscribe to, or read regularly the following publications, subtract one year for each: People magazine, National Enquirer, Midnight, Physical Plant and You, Reader's Digest and the K-State Collegian.

Subtract 13 years if you grew up in a city of more than one million, although you're fine if you spend at least 48 weeks a year on vacation.

IF YOU own an Anita Bryant record, subtract one year, but if you've melted it down to a fruit bowl, add a year. The same goes for Pat Boone records.

Add four months if you've won the Olympic Decathlon but subtract four months if you play rugby. Add two years to your life expectancy if you've climbed Mt. Everest, and another two if you made it back down.

While these aren't all the things which enter into how long you might live, they are representative of the list. The idea is that activities which are physically, spiritually or morally taxing might lead to an early death. If, however, as in the case of the decathlon and Mt. Everest, you prove to be up to the task, you can gain additional years.

The reason the Society for the Determination of Life Expectancies printed the list wasn't to give Americans a list of proper behavior patterns to ensure longer life. The society merely felt that, after everyone finds they'll live either to 72 or 81, they will go out and do all sorts of zany things during their last year.

Naturally, they reason, after discovering that the way we live influences how long we live, we won't go and take that last fling and make fools out of ourselves only to find we'll be sticking around for a few more years.

K-State, Manhattan share beginnings

Editor's Note: This is the first of a two part story on K-State history.

By BARBARA RUST
Collegian Reporter

It all began March 24, 1855 when Isaac Goodnow and his friends reached a place later named "Manhattan."

Goodnow's group from Boston promoted the anti-slavery movements and moved to Kansas to spread their views westward.

He viewed the area from Bluemont Hill and thought it was the perfect site for a town. A few others were already here and on June 1, 1855, the town was named Manhattan.

K-State grew from a small preparatory school called Bluemont Central College.

In 1858, prominent Manhattan settlers, including Goodnow, Joseph Denison and Washington Marlatt, obtained a charter from the legislative assembly of the Territory of Kansas for the Bluemont Central College Association.

AT THE OUTSET, Bluemont Central College's objectives were to promote education and science in the territory and to develop an agricultural department.

In 1861, Manhattanites and trustees of Bluemont Central College tried to establish the state university at Manhattan. The proposal was presented to the legislature, but the governor vetoed it.

According to "History of Kansas State College of Agriculture and Applied Science" by Julius Willard, "Gov. Charles Robinson was a citizen of Lawrence, and November 2, 1863, the University was located in that city."

THE MORRILL ACT, passed by Congress in 1862, provided for land grant colleges. On Feb. 3, 1863, the state of Kansas accepted its provisions, making K-State the first land-grant college. Willard writes, "a college for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts was permanently located" in Manhattan.

On Feb. 16, 1863, the school's name was changed to Kansas State Agricultural College (KSAC). An episcopal minister, Joseph Denison, became its first president. He previously taught mental and moral science, ancient languages, political economy and history.

Perhaps the most important development of Denison's administration was the farmer's institute on June 23, 1868. It allowed the faculty to visit Kansas residents and give lectures on agricultural subjects, agricultural principles and aims of KSAC.

JOHN ANDERSON, the second president, was pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Junction City and professor of political economy. When he became president, his salary was $2500.

According to Willard, Anderson said young men's educations were to prepare them to earn a living farming or in one of the industrial arts. He suggested little for young women except "to enhance their qualifications for homemaking. He doubtless expected that only a few women would be gainfully employed outside their homes."

In 1876, the present Holtz Hall was built. It was originally the chemistry building. After the interior was destroyed by fire in 1900, the building was remodeled into the girls' gymnasium. In 1911, chemistry was relocated in Holtz Hall.

The building is now the Center for Student Development and was named after A.A. Holtz, secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association.

WILLARD WRITES, "In 1877 the legislature appropriated $12,500 to build the north wing of the building later named Anderson Hall. The wing was designated in the law as Practical Agricultural Building."

The north wing was completed in 1879, the central wing in 1882 and the south wing in 1884.

George Fairchild, professor of logic, political economy and philosophy, became president in 1879. He wanted a college for people in agriculture or those preparing for occupations related to agriculture. Sewing, cooking and dairy work were for women; carpentry, gardening and farming for the men.

Mainly through Nellie Sawyer Kedzie's efforts, the 1897 Kansas legislature appropriated $16,000 for a building for domestic economy. It was dedicated in 1899.

Willard writes, "It (domestic economy building) was given the name Kedzie Hall in honor of Professor Kedzie in 1902. This is believed to be the first building in the country provided for work in home economics."

PROFESSOR Maximilian Kern made "planting plans" for KSAC. He grouped certain trees together to make the campus an outdoor laboratory. Chet Peters, vice president for student affairs, said the oldest trees on campus are two pine trees between Anderson and Eisenhower halls.

At first, the K-State library was meager because the legislature didn't support it. According to Willard, "A classic expression attributed to one of the state senators was to the effect that he did not believe that the faculty had read all the books that they already had in the library."

In 1893, the legislature appropriated $60,000 for a Library and Agricultural Hall. It was completed in 1894 and was named Fairchild Hall in 1902.

The first organized sport at KSAC was baseball. There were 10 games in 1897. In 1883, an Athletic Club was started. Interest in football began in 1890, but a club failed to get approval in 1891.

Willard writes, "President Fairchild expressed his belief that intercollegiate contests of any kind are serious intrusions upon the regular work of the students participating and that the mass of students are merely entertained."

THE BOARD of Regents fired the entire faculty in 1897 and President Fairchild resigned.

Thomas Will, professor of economics and philosophy, was the next president. He is the only president who doesn't have a building named after him.

In 1899, the legislature appropriated $25,000 for an agriculture building. It was completed in 1900. The agricultural departments moved to Waters Hall in 1913 and the original building was used as a vocational school. In 1924, the education department moved there and it was named Holton Hall after Edwin Holton, education department head and dean of summer school.

Aggieville patronage alters during summer

Aggieville serves less students and more local residents in the summer months.

The effect of fewer students seems to create a noticeable decrease in business, but another type of customer emerges in the summertime - the local Manhattan residents, according to Terry Ray, owner of several taverns in Aggieville.

In the retailing business, a substantial decrease in revenue used to be apparent in the summer, but this is not as true anymore.

"Three years ago our revenue decreased in the summer, but each year business seems to get better," said Marsha Nolte, manager of Carousel.

"We had the best month in June that we've ever had. This is due to the increase of summer school student enrollment, markdowns and summer sales," Nolte said.

"Our store has experienced gains this summer over last, but we do about a 5 per cent decrease of business in the summer months as compared to fall and spring semesters," said Tana Livingood, manager of Keller's Too.

"THE FAST FOOD business and movie theaters are noticing the absence of students, but our business would be 40 to 50 per cent more if it were during the fall or spring semester," said Don Rhine, assistant manager of Hardee's.

"The only difference I notice during the summer is the lack of students and increase of Manhattan residents. Business has remained stable," said Bob Howard, manager of Campus Theater.

The films that are played in the summer are not released according to any particular population. Theaters have no jurisdiction in this area and must play whatever is available, according to Howard.

The merchants of Aggieville are anticipating a good fall semester and looking forward to the return of the students. They also agree the additional parking Aggieville will soon have is going to be an asset to business with both students and local residents.

T-shirts: cheap, expressive, popular

By LISA SANDMEYER
Collegian Reporter

The T-shirt showed a picture of a guy looking bummed-out, sitting on a chair, drinking beer.

"I don't like you either," it read.

T-shirts of all designs, expressions, names and places have been increasing in popularity the past few years.

"T-shirts are cheap, they're expressive and they're easy to care for," said Cindy Railsback, graduate in business.

Railsback said her favorite T-shirt says "Go climb a rock" and is put out by the Yosemite Mountaineering School.

SARAH BURDEN, a student at Manhattan High School, has been collecting T-shirts since grade school.

"They're easy to buy and cheap. I just pick them up now and then," she said.

Burden's favorite shirt in her collection is one of Mickey and Minnie Mouse conversing in Chinese.

T-shirts are bought as souvenirs by some. "There's got to be a reason why I buy a shirt," said Chris Grider, sophomore in pre-design. Grider said she always gets her shirts "from somewhere."

Of Grider's more than four dozen T-shirts, most come from colleges and universities, and she insists each comes from the campus.

T-SHIRTS with sayings printed on them haven't been popular for too long, Grider said.

"When I was a kid, colored T-shirts were big," she said.

College T-shirts and jerseys are a way for students and fans to wear their support for the school, according to John Levine of Varney's Bookstore. T-shirt sales dropped nationally four or five years ago but stayed up at K-State.

"It could have been that K-State students were willing to identify with K-State," Levine said.

At K-State, the trend is toward more expensive shirts and jerseys and away from the crew-neck, short-sleeved, 100 per cent cotton T-shirt, said Kay Waggoner, clerk at the K-State Union bookstore.

PURPLE is hard to get in most styles, because there aren't many schools in the U.S. that have purple in their school colors. The jerseys sell well, Waggoner said, because it's the easiest style to get purple in.

It has become popular in recent years to have T-shirts printed with names, events and expressions.

"You can hardly sell a shirt without printing on it," said Ross Ballard of Ballard's Sporting Goods. Ballard's has had a shirt-printing service for two years. In shirts other than K-State shirts, gold is the most popular color, according to Sheryl Ballard.

Transfers (pictures and designs) are as popular as individual names or event printing. The Farrah Fawcett-Majors transfer was the biggest seller this year.

"Do It In Aggieville" is also a big seller. Students leaving K-State buy them to wear on vacations and places where people have never heard of Aggieville.

RESIDENCE halls and greek chapter designs are among the more artistic ones, Ballard said.

For those wishing to express themselves, there are commercially printed T-shirts for any desire. Here are some of them:

"Eat Pigeon"
"Use the Force" (from the movie Star Wars)

"There are no sharks in Kansas" (available in any state)

"Pharmacists make safer lovers"
"Spock for President"
"Anita Bryant will get over it"
Or from New York and its great events: "Where were you when the lights went out?" and "I survived the blizzard of '77" (Buffalo)

FOR EXPECTANT mothers:
"I'm not fat, I'm just pregnant"
"Baby" with an arrow pointing down and "Mommy" with an arrow pointing up.

The "American Streaking Society" T-shirt was popular a few years ago as was the "Kansas State Streaking Team."

Chemists can get shirts with the periodic table on the front.

For the easily confused, some T-shirts come marked "front" and "back."

The Lung Association put out a shirt with lungs on the front and their message "Breathe Easy," on the back.

The Pride of Wildcat Land Marching Band trumpeters tell the world to "Blow it out your brass" and the trombonists "do it in seven positions."

"Where the hell is Manhattan, Kansas?" and "Where the hell is KU?" could soon be followed with "Where the hell is Kansas?"

Research to last 4 to 5 years

Contact lens being tested

By SHEREE LOWE
Collegian Reporter

A new contact lens is being investigated by 40 to 50 optometrists throughout the nation under the jurisdiction of the Food and Drug Administration (FDA).

The lenses being researched are a modification of the soft contact lens that became available in 1972.

The new lens contains about 50 per cent water content as opposed to the usual 30 to 35 per cent content.

"The advantage of these new lenses is that they can be worn 24 hours a day," said Gary Yamada, optometrist in Sacramento, Calif., and one of the members of the research team.

"Another advantage of the lens is that the wearer has the convenience and safety of not handling the contact as much as a regular lens. These new lenses only need to be cleaned once every two weeks and at that time should be placed in a wetting solution for six to twelve hours," Yamada said.

THE RESEARCH began in April, 1976, with phase one, which was the launch of the initial lens and researchers prescribed the lens to 1000 patients.

The wearers were checked periodically until just recently. The second phase of the research has just begun and the researchers have eliminated the unsuccessful wearers, who were generally patients who required very thick lens.

"The successful patients that are now in phase two will continue to be watched and checked along with other research that is being planned to test the viability and wearability of the new lens," Yamada said.

"The most crucial point in order for success of the lens is that the wearer is able to get enough oxygen into the cornea," Yamada said.

YAMADA predicts the research will not be completed for four to five years.

The new lens will be approximately $75 more than regular contact lenses. Researchers who are currently prescribing the lens are charging $400 to $500.

Approximately nine to 10 million people in America wear contact lenses, with one million of these people wearing the regular soft contact lens, according to Yamada.

"The success ratio in my opinion is twice as good with soft contacts in comparison with the hard lenses," Yamada said.

The main reason some people may not be able to wear the soft lens is due to their stigmatism factor. Some stigmatisms do not allow as sharp of vision with the soft lens, according to Yamada.

"Optometrists in Kansas will not be authorized to fit their patients with the new lens until the FDA feels that enough evidence has been presented to confirm the reliability and credibility of the new lens," said Gary Young, local optometrist.

Graduates can get free alumni benefits

Upon receiving their undergraduate degrees, students can obtain a two year membership for free in the K-State alumni program, according to Dean Hess, director of alumni relations.

The two year plan, which started in 1963, offers many benefits to new as well as old alumni.

"Alums have discount rates in recreation activities on the equivalent to those of the faculty," Hess said.

IN ADDITION there are many other benefits that alums can enjoy, including the right to vote on the board of directors, participating in the annual family camp at Rock Springs Ranch and receiving copies of the K-Stater.

This year the alumni program is offering three trips for alumni.

"In August we are taking a trip to Scandinavia, later this fall we will be going to Ireland and in January there will be a cruise on the Caribbean up through the Panama Canal and along the coast of Mexico," Hess said.

According to Hess, a new insurance program is being devised and will be available late next spring.

"The insurance program will be available to members only and will work as a group insurance policy," he said.

Carter attempts to block criticism by black leaders

WASHINGTON (AP)—President Carter, who readily acknowledges the role black voters played in electing him, is moving quickly in public and private to cut off criticism of his administration by black leaders. Soon after Vernon Jordan, executive director of the National Urban League, issued a stinging critique Sunday of the Carter administration's first six months, the President, members of his Cabinet and White House aides were responding with aggressive defenses of the administration's work.

Jordan had told the Urban League convention that "many black people feel that their hopes and their needs have been betrayed" by what he said was the administration's unresponsiveness to black problems.

The Urban League is a predominantly black organization interested in civil rights and city problems.

CARTER WAS joined by two ranking black Cabinet-level officials, U.N. Ambassador Andrew Young and Patricia Roberts Harris, the secretary of housing and urban development, in defending the administration before the convention.

On Tuesday, Labor Secretary Ray Marshall told the convention that the administration is dedicated to strict enforcement of the nation's civil rights laws "after eight years of not-so-benign neglect."

Atty. Gen. Griffin Bell later addressed the convention, making him the fourth Cabinet-level official to take the podium.

Marshall said Carter has made civil rights a key area of his government reorganization project in order to improve coordination among agencies responsible for enforcing those laws.

When Carter addressed the convention Monday, he called Jordan "my good friend," and said the improvements he wanted to make in the lives of poor people would take more time.

THEN, privately, Carter took Jordan aside and made clear his feeling that public criticism of the administration was "damaging to the hopes and aspirations of those poor people."

Jordan said later that Carter may have bought some time, but not much. He also felt his criticism was "a fair and just analysis."

Carter also drew criticism from Newark, N.J., Mayor Kenneth Gibson who said his colleagues were too cautious about criticizing Carter. Gibson proceeded to say the President had misled his audience about his welfare and jobs programs.

The criticism caught Carter by surprise, an aide said. It was coming from blacks, whom Carter has said in November were "so instrumental in helping me become elected to the highest office in our land."

Students favor sports attire

By LAURIE LYNCH
Collegian Reporter

Don't be surprised to see tennis wear on or off the court. Fashion has allowed the tennis dress to make its debut as an outfit as well as sportswear.

The trend of wearing sportswear as fashion is predominant in a college town because so many people are sports oriented, said Cindy Houston, sportswear buyer for Keller's.

"Sports have become such a big thing," she said.

Hudson said Keller's doesn't stock sportswear heavily because of the sports shops. The sportswear doesn't sell better than other merchandise, she said, except the tennis wear.

"Tennis wear is a different thing. People want to look stylish," Hudson said.

All of the tennis wear is at the Keller's Too store in Aggieville.

SUSAN BROWNE, junior buyer for Browne's Department Store, attributes the sale of sportswear fashions to their color.

"White is very popular this summer," she said. Jogging sweats are big, she said, "because so many kids jog."

Like Keller's, Browne's doesn't stock sportswear heavily. Browne said this is because "there are so many little sports stores in this town." Sportswear makes up about 10 per cent of their stock, Browne said.

Carousel Manager Marcia Nolte said she believes the trend of wearing sportswear as fashion is "world wide." Also, she believes the Farrah Fawcett Majors craze has added to the trend.

"I call them playthings. People would rather wear something like that because they're more comfortable," Nolte said.

"The lifestyle people are living now and the exercise they're wanting to get has carried over into fashion," said Eleanor Brent, owner of Woody's Ladies Shop.

THE NATURAL push, the free and easy look, even the soft look is seen in warm-ups and tennis wear, Brent said.

Sally Helvenston, instructor in clothing and textiles, also said she believes it is a step toward the natural fiber that has caused sportswear to become fashion.

"I think it's all a part of our trend toward casual dressing," she said.

Helvenston said in the late 19th century and early 20th century, "clothing was a status symbol." But, according to Helvenston it's not so much now.

"Comfortable, stretchy kinds of things are the trend now," Helvenston said.

Will something new be taking the place of sportswear in the fashion world?

"As long as they're (sports) big, it's hard to say how long they'll be in," Hudson said.

Fashion journals have given no hint that the sportswear fashion look is going out, Helvenston said. "Who knows?" she said.

Cable rates increase

By SHEREE LOWE
Collegian Reporter

Owners of cable TV outlets will have an increase of 55 cents on their bills starting next month.

"Due to inflationary costs, cable rates increase from $6.95 to $7.50 for basic service for one primary outlet of cable TV, effective Aug. 1," said Dick Thiessen, general manager of Manhattan's Cable TV.

This will affect a large number of Mannattan residents because 86 per cent of the homes that have cable available to them in the Manhattan area are users.

This will be the first increase for cable owners since 1961.

FM MUSIC is provided on channels six and 13 with a cable hook-up, but homes or offices that hook stereos to the cable FM have never been charged.

"These homes and offices that have FM tuners and hook it up to the cable outlet will be charged $1 per month for the easy listening music they receive," Thiessen said.

"Inflation has increased 33 per cent since 1974 and there has been a 7.9 per cent increase on basic service. With this in mind, we are hoping this increase to remain stable for the next year and a half or two years," Thiessen said.

Children to perform in 'Sound of Music'

"The Sound of Music" will be presented at 8 p.m. today through Saturday at Manhattan's Arts in the Park.

The musical is sponsored by the Manhattan Recreation Commission and will be performed by the Manhattan Children's Theater Company.

The cast of over 50 persons was picked in May and the children have been practicing for over a month. The cast consists of junior and senior high school students plus a few grade school students.

There is an admission charge of $2 for adults, $1.50 for junior and senior high school students and 75 cents for children.

Be a Saturday hero.

A hero isn't just somebody who can dazzle a crowd. A hero is somebody who makes a difference. And it isn't really as hard as it sounds. All you have to do is give a little of your time each week and you can be a hero to a fatherless boy. He needs someone to look up to. Someone to show him he can grow up to be the man he'd like to be. You can be that someone any day of the week. Call your local Big Brothers today. And be a real hero.

Be a Big Brother.

K-State's past built by presidents, faculty

Editors note: This is the second of a two-part feature on K-State history.

By BARBARA RUST
Collegian Reporter

Throughout the 1900s, K-State's campus continued to grow. New buildings, presidents, courses and faculty helped take Kansas State Agricultural College (KSAC) to Kansas State University in almost six decades.

Ernest Nichols, professor of physics and electrical engineering, was the fifth president, serving from 1899 to 1909.

Mary Pierce Van Zile, professor of domestic science and dean of women in 1908, later became dean of the Division of Home Economics.

Van Zile Hall, once a dormitory for women, now co-ed, was completed in 1926. According to Julius Willard, K-State historian, "Dean Van Zile in 1924 regarded a dormitory as needed, a) to set standards of conduct for all students, b) to create a standard of living at moderate cost and c) to aid in creating a finer spirit of democracy."

In 1903, R.F. Booth, assistant professor of physics became the football coach. According to Willard, this was the first example in the country of regular faculty members coaching athletics. He was assisted by M. F. ("Mike") Ahearn, foreman of the greenhouses. C.W. Melick, assistant professor of dairying, coached baseball and track.

BEGINNING in 1906, Ahearn coached all sports. In 1920, he became head of the physical education department and director of athletics.

Henry Waters was the sixth president from 1909 to 1917. He was the dean of the College of Agriculture at the University of Missouri and the first president of KSAC to come from another school.

Cooney hopes to change dorm's image

Woman hired to direct Edwards Hall

By DEBBIE BURKLUND
Collegian Reporter

A director has been hired for Edwards Hall—a female director.

Paula Cooney, the new director, says being a female will cause no problems in the position.

"It will be easier for a female in that you don't have a male ego problem. It's not like one man forcing rules on another man."

"Authority is hard to take. But there's no glory in yelling down a female," Cooney said.

COONEY said she expects the same kinds of problems common in any residence hall.

"Every housing situation is unique. Every community is unique," she said. "It's (Edwards Hall) going to have a special air about it. Ours is going to probably have more of a personality because we have more of the same kind of people than everyone else."

"I really don't expect the horrendous kind of problems people keep telling me are going to be there," Cooney said.

One of the major problems of Edwards Hall was the physical plant, she said.

"The housing people have done a fantastic job this summer. All the housing people have just put in PAULA COONEY...

Director of Edwards Hall

hour after hour working on that plant. It looks great."

THE REMODELING of Edwards Hall will not be finished for a year.

"But it's such a vast improvement and it's just going to make such a difference initially that a lot of the problems are going to go away," she said. "Once it's clean and neat and a healthy environment it will be my job to keep it that way."

Cooney said the hall has a lot of problems to start with and said she hopes everyone can get a good grip on these problems from the beginning.

"I've had super good reports from the guys about the kind of cooperation I'm going to get," she said. "The housing people are being wonderful. Tom Frith (director of housing) has been just excellent to deal with."

"I met some of the coaches and they just seem great as far as backing me up in my job and my staff," Cooney said. "Housing rules will be the basis of the structure," she said.

DURING THE next semester Edwards Hall will be involved in establishing governmental and disciplinary boards comparable to those in other halls, she said.

"Until that time I probably will be doing the majority of that under the direction of Tom Frith. It's (the dorm's) own personality will have to be developed."

COONEY SAID she has several goals for the residence hall.

"I want first of all to deal with the physical plant and within a year have it back in excellent shape," she said.

Cooney's second goal is to set-up a social environment for the students living in the hall.

"Those guys have been so isolated," she said. "I would like to set up a social environment where they were a part of the normal campus social environment."

"There are a lot of very nice guys over there who are suffering from a reputation that has been there for years," Cooney said.

"You come in as a freshman and you find out that you're not invited to things because of the reputation. Hopefully we can do away with some of that."

NON-ATHLETES will also be living in Edwards Hall this fall.

"It's going to give it a different flair when you bring in other people," Cooney said.

"I think it would be very naive to say that it (the bad image) won't carry over. Hopefully within the next semester people can see that it's a whole new ballgame."

Cooney said she hopes to present Edwards Hall to the campus "as something other than a stable for animals."

Customers meet with officials of KPL

By NANCY DENNING
Collegian Reporter

Kansas Power and Light Company (KP&L) is concerned about what their customers will think about KP&L's service, the energy crisis and the rising cost of energy services.

In an informal meeting Wednesday night with approximately 50 randomly selected customers of KP&L, administrative officials discussed various problems.

The major complaint registered in the service area was the busy signal received from the KP&L office when there was a power blackout in Manhattan.

"This was a problem we (KP&L officials) were unaware of, but it is reasonable to guess that if the lines are busy the blackout is being reported," said Bill Wall, president of KP&L.

COMPLAINTS concerning estimation of bills were aired by a number of the participants.

"Meters are read every month," Wall said. The problem lies with new meter readers who are not familiar with the meter they are reading and with the computer that is unable to read the numbers written by the meter reader, he said.

The pros and cons of KP&L converting to nuclear energy were discussed. The major concern was where the waste from the nuclear plants would be disposed.

"The waste can be stored in salt domes, but the real problem lies in the transportation of getting the waste from the plants to the domes," Wall said. He noted that 10 per cent of all power in the U.S. is generated by nuclear power.

"The energy sale is up eight per cent over the last year," Wall said. "A more dependable supply of electricity must be devised. Americans want to find a quick, easy and cheap way today for tomorrow."

WALL was asked how long KP&L could be expected to meet the existing demand for residential and commercial needs. He said Kansas was clearly ahead of the eastern and northern sections of the United States. He refused to make a definite commitment due to federal government regulation of energy supplies in Kansas.

Life line rates were discussed as relevant to lower income citizens.

"The plan would be to sub-charge certain groups of people in lower income groups. By doing this other customers would be forced to pay higher costs to offset the expense," Wall said.

THE MAJORITY of customers attending the meeting were not in favor of life line rates.

McDowell Creek road opens Sept. 1

Planned re-opening for McDowell Creek Road is Sept. 1.

Contractors are still working on the project, according to Dan Harden of the Riley County Engineer's office. Grading is completed and the surface is now ready for asphalt and the rock shoulders.

The only problem that could delay the project's finish would be inclement weather, Harden said.

Past administrators, faculty affect K-State's development

Until 1919, Anderson Hall had a chapel and all students were required to attend at 8:30 a.m. unless their parents excused them. The chapel was removed then and a recreation center put in its place.

The basement of Anderson had a barber shop in 1919 to accommodate soldiers, but was removed after World War I.

HARRY Umberger worked extensively with the extension program. He was supervisor of demonstrations in extension, county agent leader and dean of the Division of College Extension.

Louis Williams, who Williams Auditorium in Umberger Hall is named after, was also active in extension work. He was professor of horticulture in extension and director of extension schools in agriculture, home economics and extension specialists.

Some fraternities began in 1901, but because entrance requirements to KSAC were substandard, they could not obtain national affiliation. When 15 units of high school were required for entrance, several chapters of national sororities and fraternities were started between 1913 and 1915.

According to Willard, President Waters wasn't enthusiastic about fraternities and sororities. He recognized some of their good features and had sympathetic cooperation, but no official recognition was given to them.

Waters Hall was built and named in 1919 by the Board of Administration. It housed the agricultural departments.

William Jardine, professor of agronomy and dean of the Division of Agriculture and director of Agricultural Experiment Station, was the seventh president from 1918 to 1925. He sought a balance between vocational and liberal education, Willard wrote.

THOMPSON Hall was originally built "for instruction in institutional management, including the practical operation of a cafeteria, tearoom and banquet rooms," according to Willard. It was opened in 1922 and named after Helen Thompson, dean of the Division of Home Economics.

Even in the 1920s, Dean Thompson believed "that other things being equal, women should receive as generous pay as men," Willard wrote. She tried to get pay increases for women in her department.

Mehitable Wilson left $20,000 to the school in memory of her husband, Davies Wilson. The money helped build the president's residence in 1923. Professor Cecil Baker, head of the department of architecture, designed it.

A plaque was placed by the front door of the president's residence as a reminder of Wilson's contribution.

Margaret Justin became dean of home economics in 1923. Under her leadership, "Hospitality Days," or home economics open house was started.

Frances David Farrell became the eighth president in 1925. He was dean of the Division of Agriculture and director of the Agricultural Experiment Station.

PRESIDENT Farrell wanted only state money to be used to build University buildings. Farrell Library, however, was built with both federal and state money.

Alvin Cardwell became professor of physics in 1936. He worked for three years on the Manhattan Project at Oakridge, attempting to separate uranium for the atomic bomb.

"One is very appreciative of the fact the Board of Regents and administration wish to recognize your contribution," said Cardwell, now a Manhattan resident. "K-State has gone from a college with narrow objectives to a real university."

In 1931, the school's name was changed to Kansas State College and in 1959 to Kansas State University.

Milton Eisenhower was the ninth president from 1943 to 1950; James McCain from 1951 to 1974 when Duane Acker replaced him.

JERUSALEM—Prime Minister Menahem Begin vowed Wednesday to continue settling Jews on the occupied West Bank of the Jordan River and called American protests unjustified.

In Washington, President Carter added his weight to a State Department complaint over Israel's recognition of disputed Jewish settlements in the territory, now under Israeli military rule.

"We stand on the right of Jews to live in any part of the land of Israel," Begin said. He has stated that the land of Israel includes the West Bank.

In a decision that Begin said was acceptable to the government, a committee Tuesday gave full legal status to three settlements founded in 1975 by Jewish nationalists without the approval of the government of Begin's predecessor, Yitzhak Rabin.

WASHINGTON—Americans bought 25 per cent more than they sold to foreign countries last month, plunging the U.S. trade deficit to a monthly record and widening a trade gap that may continue for 10 years, the government reported Wednesday.

The deficit was blamed in part for a 19.75-point drop in stock prices as measured by the Dow Jones industrial average, sending that index to an 18-month low Wednesday, and for recent weaknesses in the dollar.

A weaker dollar shrinks the purchasing power of Americans in the world market.

PHILADELPHIA—It rained $20 bills here Wednesday.

The windfall came from a broken sack containing more than $250,000 in $20 bills that skittered out of the unlocked back door of an armored truck. The truck had just made a pickup at a federal reserve bank in the busy downtown area.

Surprised motorists and pedestrians quickly stuffed their pockets with whatever they could grab.

"They were on their hands and knees, grabbing money right and left," said Policeman Roland Elliott who stopped en route to work to help recover the swirling green stuff. "Nobody was mad. Nobody was pushing anybody. There was enough to go around."

CHAPPEL, Neb.—An 18-year-old woman escaped Wednesday from the man who allegedly had abducted her in Kansas City by pretending to go to the rest room at a cafe in western Nebraska and notifying the police.

Lori Taylor "is physically okay but shook up," reported Chappel Police Chief Walter Faustman, who arrested the man himself.

Faustman said the young woman told Paul Forsythe, 25, she would be back after visiting the rest room. Instead of going there, she fled into the kitchen and a waitress ran to the police station next door.

"When I walked into the cafe, he was still sitting there, waiting for her to come back," Faustman said, adding the suspect offered no resistance. The arrest came about 2:15 p.m., he said.

SANTA BARBARA, Calif.—The string of a box kite that became entangled in a power line was blamed Wednesday for a fire that burned 385 buildings in this seaside resort community before it was stopped at the edge of downtown, authorities said.

Santa Barbara County Fire Chief William Patterson said the fire that swept out of a canyon late Tuesday and into the city was contained at 720 acres late Wednesday afternoon. Early damage estimates exceeded $76 million, he said.

Moments after the blaze was contained, Santa Barbara Dist. Atty. Stanley Roden told reporters that the fire was not the work of an arsonist, as had earlier been supposed by police.

Meeting to focus on cereal grains

The Kansas Agricultural Experiment Station Fall Cereal Conference will be held at K-State today and tomorrow.

The conference is a work session for plant scientists concerned with the fall cereal crops, said Ted Walter, conference chairman and assistant professor of agronomy. Walter said there is a need to discuss what has been learned about planted crops in the current year and to make plans for the coming year. Conference topics will include varieties of winter wheat, newly-bred varieties, breeding objectives and principles problems.

Those attending the conference include agronomists, entomologists, pathologists, agricultural economists and grain marketing utilization specialists from across the state.

There will be a panel discussion entitled "Improving the Protein Level of Kansas Wheat" which will discuss topics such as soil fertility, plant physiology and breeding. The group moderator will be Robert Bohannon, professor of agronomy.

Lowell Burchett, secretary and treasurer of the Kansas State Crop Improvement Association, will speak today on semi-dwarf wheats in Kansas. Insects and crop diseases will be discussed on Friday.

Adult life planning theme of institute

The Department of Adult and Occupational Education will sponsor an adult educational institute July 31 to Aug. 5, in Granby, Colo., at Snow Mountain Ranch.

Adult life planning and counseling are the themes of the institute.

The objective of the institute is to "bring adult educators together to share ideas and build programs that they can take home and use," said Gale Baumgardner, institute coordinator.

Organizers hope the institute will help those attending to be more successful and more comfortable in helping an adult in making major decisions in his life, such as career planning or coping with personal problems. Rosalind Loring will be the keynote speaker for the institute. She was president of the Adult Education Association of the United States in 1976-77 and is the dean of the College of Continuing Education at the University of Southern California.

45 to 50 persons are expected to attend the institute, Baumgardner said. This is the third year the Department of Adult and Occupational Education has sponsored something like this, she said.

Pedestrians, drivers can ease the war

There is a continuing war on this campus being waged between pedestrians and automobile operators. Drivers sneer and snarl at pedestrians who walk nonchalantly into the street in front of their cars.

Pedestrians glare at drivers who zip through pedestrian crossings with nary a glance at the signs which say, "The pedestrian has the right of way at all times."

Hold it. With a little common courtesy and some respect for the law, this problem could easily be resolved.

For those who drive through campus, remember, the pedestrian does have the right of way. It is law that if a pedestrian is standing in the crosswalk, an approaching vehicle must stop for him.

THIS LAW is repeatedly violated at the crosswalk between Kedzie and Anderson Halls, although a sign is posted in the middle of the street for drivers to see. Cars speed through the intersection in complete disregard for pedestrians in the area.

The crosswalk across Anderson Ave. toward the Ramada Inn is another which is blatantly ignored.

Drivers, if you hit someone while he is in the crosswalk, you will probably be subject to a large fine and a suspended license.

Pedestrians, too, need to show some courtesy. A driver who stops for a pedestrian should be acknowledged, perhaps with a wave or smile.

And, pedestrians, take the weather into consideration. If it is raining or snowing, a car cannot easily stop. So don't jump in front of a vehicle although you may have the right of way. It could be dangerous to your health.

The number of cars being driven on campus increases each year. It is unfortunate that cars are allowed on campus at all, the elimination of them would end the war. But as long as pedestrians and drivers have to live with each other, some respect and courtesy would ease the tension of the battle.

The bondage of masculinity

Webster's defines a man as being "virile, brave or accomplished" and defines masculine as "manly" or, when applied to women as "mannish," "unbecomingly masculine."

Again the beginning of the carousel of label games, the favorite seeming to be the "how-many-ways-can-we-divide-ourselves" game. He plays masculine and she plays feminine, but we all have our different interpretations of these traits. We begin responding to each other in terms of what we expect the other to do or how we expect the other to behave.

"What do you look for in a man?" friends often ask.

"I don't" is my usual answer.

By that I am saying we can no more stereotype or pre-judge men than we can women.

AN AMERICAN male is always facing an uphill climb, a rather steep one. He has to be A Man and many of his mannerisms considered typically feminine lessen his credibility in that role. He is faced with the pressure of proving himself and being successful. And he, too, must marry. Only it's not quite as easy for him. When he does, he is expected to be prepared to support a wife and any cooperative products.

Another criterion society stipulates for A Man to have includes a still upper lip. He is not to cry and is supposed to be a near-professional at withholding and controlling his emotions. He is also expected to be chauvinistic, chivalrous, cold and calculated. His ego must be immense and, of course, infallible and indestructible. Generally, it is said his basic attraction to the opposite sex is sexual.

Many of these criteria, experts say, are culturally induced. There is truth in that. Men get caught up in the Roszak game, reacting to previous role models and to women who are playing feminine. Soon the self-fulfilling prophecy sets in and then it's too late.

A man is busy being the masculine man he worked so hard to become and it's difficult, if not impossible, to undo what has been so neatly and fervently accomplished.

MEN TODAY are growing more conscious of the fact that they, too, are strapped in sex roles. Moreover, many are expressing a desire to break free of the role and to be allowed to act upon their own unique needs and objectives.

In January's Psychology Today, Carol Tavris, a social psychologist, said many women say that despite liberated ideals, their desires are still unliberated. These women realize an ambivalence in terms of their male expectations. They need "the gentle, yielding, affectionate" side of men which they rarely see, yet they demand the dominant, aggressive qualities and a man who is muscular either in brain, brawn or both.

Lest women forget, while screaming about freedom from their own sex roles, we must all recognize men are not homogeneous either. Their lifestyles are varied, their personalities many and it is nice to see everyone doesn't think "rough 'n tough" is the image women desire of men.

Tavris said the Hemingway Hero is on the way out and I am inclined to agree with her. It is no longer a necessity for a man to prove himself to the world. It's everybody's world and, hopefully, we will grow together and be more receptive to one another's needs and characteristics, whether traditional or atypical.

Apartheid obsolete, but practiced

Under the continuing scorn of the rest of the world, the white minority of South Africa continues its policy of apartheid, the legal protection and barrier between white and black. Soon, the racist wall will collapse under revolution, even the whites realize that. But the unanswerable question seems to be what motivates the handful of whites in South Africa to resist change.

The South African whites are surely risking their own safety to protect an institution which is dead throughout much of the world.

Why?

FOR THE most part, the unwillingness of the whites to abandon their separatist policies seems to be total paranoia. As only 17 per cent of the population, whites are clinging to everything they have out of fear of the black majority. They have lived under their racial separation for so long that they are afraid of what majority rule would mean.

The apartheid laws aren't merely a racist custom, they are civil laws designed to keep to a minimum any contact whites might have with blacks. They are not merely designed to keep blacks out of power, although that is their chief function. They are written so that every aspect of South African life, from social contact to business, is dominated by the racist white.

A government permit is required for most social interactions between black and white, unless, of course, as in the case of athletics, it is profitable for the white to do otherwise.

Much of South Africa boasts valuable natural resources, from diamonds to rich mineral deposits such as gold. Through the apartheid laws, whites can control the wealth although they compose only one fifth of the country's population.

THE RESIDENTS of South Africa and Rhodesia know no other way. Blacks and whites have been raised with strict segregation and, while it is decaying their society, whites have no reason to yield to majority rule—at least not yet.

What is certain to happen soon has been brewing for years.

Bloody revolution will eventually give blacks the power they deserve, but world leaders have been hoping to prevent bloodshed.

In Mozambique and Angola blacks have recently risen to power, and the revolution which has manifested itself in South African and Rhodesian terrorist raids will surely come to a head soon.

If, amid international condemnation of these countries' strict racist policies and warnings of continued violence in their countries, the white minority continues its present course, it will deserve whatever punishment the blacks care to dish out.

Supporters of apartheid apparently feel that the races were formed by God for a reason, and that reason is so they can be separated. But behind the theological rationalizing is the fact that they have a good thing going despite economic sanctions placed on them by other countries.

They have been pretty successful so far with racism, but the white minority in South Africa and Rhodesia has to be considered a dying breed.

Local priest says Archbishop Lefebvre misguided and revolt will be short-lived

By MIKE NOEL
Collegian Reporter

The furor caused by French Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre is seen by some as the potential catalyst of the biggest division in the Roman Catholic Church in centuries.

Father Norbert Diabai, co-chaplain of Manhattan's Saint Isadore's parish, said he sees the situation differently.

"I don't think it's that serious, that it's going to cause a big split or upset in the Church. I think it's going to be a short-lived thing," Diabai said.

Lefebvre has defied the Pope and the Second Vatican Council by continuing to perform certain duties outlawed by the council such as celebrating the Latin Mass.

Lefebvre's conservative revolt started in 1971 when he set up a seminary to train priests in the old way. After ordaining 13 graduates from the seminary last summer, Lefebvre was suspended from all priestly functions by Pope Paul. The conflict arose again this summer when Lefebvre again ordained 14 priests and 16 sub-deacons from his rebel seminary.

DLABAI SAID the inconsistencies in Lefebvre's stand is the chief reason for his belief of a short-lived rebellion.

"I think his followers are really dedicated to the Church and for the time being are just a little misguided," Diabai said. "He (Lefebvre) is coming from an arch-conservative stance in the sense of desiring to retain all the practices of the past, one of which has always been a close allegiance to the Pope.

"From that kind of stance, he suddenly goes to a tremendously radical position of ignoring the Pope as the sign of unity in the Church," Diabai said.

Diabai said he supports the Pope's decision to censure Lefebvre on the basis that priests are servants of the Church.

"We are not servants in our own right, none of us, priests, bishops, archbishops or pope. We're servants of the Lord and servants of the Church. When we separate ourselves from that body (the Church) we lose our power to function in that spiritual way," he said.

ANOTHER OF Lefebvre's complaints with the Pope is the recent attempts by Pope Paul to open communications with communists and others whom Lefebvre regards as heretics. Diabai said he blames paranoia for Lefebvre's thinking on this topic and defends the Pope's actions.

"Anyone who knows of the prophets of the Old Testament, and then Jesus Christ, the apostles and the spirit of the Church since that time will know how it (the Church) is constantly going out to its enemies to seek to reconcile them—to love your enemy," Diabai said.

IRONICALLY, Diabai said he sees the potential for good to come from the Lefebvre situation. He admits some Catholics are not completely happy with the changes brought about by the Second Vatican Council.

"There's kind of a wide-spread resistance (to certain changes in the Church) and Archbishop Lefebvre shows them what the logical conclusion to that is—plain, simple defiance of the Pope," Diabai said.

"It shows many of the people the best attitude is to follow the Church. When the Church turns a corner that we may not have expected then we have to put ourselves in the judgement seat and judge the Church as though God has given us the supreme authority to judge in those kinds of matters. The truth is He gave it to the Church."

According to Time magazine, some Vatican sources believe Lefebvre has a potential flock of 50,000 to 60,000 centered in France, Germany and England. Recently, Lefebvre has attracted followers in the United States and many claim the movement has a promising future in this country.

Diabai said, however, those claims are exaggerated and Lefebvre's followers in the United States number much less than those in Europe.

'Hustle' plot depressing

Editors note: "The Hustle" will be shown at 8 tonight in the Union Forum Hall. Admission is one dollar.

By JIM CHALFANT
Collegian Reviewer

"The Hustle" deals with the anger and resentment felt by policemen at their ineffectiveness in dealing with crime.

No matter how hard they try, it seems that the courts and prisons are working against them and persons they arrest are back on the streets in no time.

Whether this is a great problem in real life, in the movies it's a very serious one. Several recent films have dealt with the same topic and it has become somewhat cliché.

"The Hustle" takes a different viewpoint to this problem, though, dealing with the effects this sort of thing has on the attitudes and personal lives of police officers.

ALTHOUGH this could have been interesting, the theme is lost in the uneven plot. There is a lot of action, but most of it doesn't fit in until the end of the movie.

Burt Reynolds plays Lt. Phil Gaines, a man frustrated by his helplessness in fighting crime. It has made him very cynical and, on the outside, he seems able to deal with it. Inside, however, he is confused about why things are so bad and his entire life is affected.

When he tries to help the parents of a girl who committed suicide, he begins to realize what it is that bothers him. The girl's father refuses to accept the fact that he can't change anything or get any justice. When Reynolds tries to explain this to the man, he realizes that the same thing has bothered him.

REYNOLDS sees everyone as a hustler, unconcerned with right or wrong, worrying only about themselves. He wants to get away from it all, but even his girlfriend (Catherine Deneuve) is hustling, as a call-girl. Although he tries to fight it, he doesn't seem too successful.

There are more conflicts than you can count in "The Hustle," most of them centering on Reynolds.

Unfortunately, most of them are never resolved. The conclusion of the movie seems to be that things are really lousy, and if you try to change them, you'll only end up worse off than you were.

If you don't agree with that conclusion, "The Hustle" is a depressing movie. It's got all the action, violence and sex other Reynolds films have, but when you add a theme, it's more than this one can handle. The plot suffers at the expense of a message and the message is so pessimistic you'll be better off ignoring it.

If you like pessimism, here it is. If not, pretend you're watching "Shamus" or "White Lightning," and you might have a good time.

Meteor shower to be seen in August

Around midnight Aug. 12 will be a good time to be star-gazing in the country.

The Earth will be at the peak of its annual travel through the Perseids meteor shower and, depending on how near the viewer is to a city, he should be able to see as many as 50 falling stars an hour.

The Perseids meteors are named for the constellation Perseus of the morning sky and are noted for being quick and bright, said Ted Geisert, summer director of the K-State planetarium.

THE PERSEIDS are believed to be the scattered remains of an old comet into which the earth's path is tilted.

The meteor shower will last several days. Viewing will be possible several days before and after the maximum intensity period on Aug. 12.

Geisert said the showers are one of the better astronomical events to observe this year because of minimal interference from the moon.

The meteors will fall as fast as 30 feet per second. They will be 50 to 100 miles above the earth so chances of a meteor reaching the ground are "not very likely," Geisert said.

There is a chance "fireballs," exploding meteors, will be visible in the shower. When they explode, there is a bright flash, sometimes of a blue-green hue, after which the meteor's tail is visible for up to 30 seconds.

UFM begins renovation of Straube

By LISA SANDMEYER
Collegian Reporter

University for Man (UFM) met with the State Fire Marshal yesterday to get approval of structural remodeling plans for the new UFM quarters, formerly Straube Scholarship House, at 1221 Thurston.

The fire marshal has already listed several things UFM must do to bring Straube up to code, according to Joe Rippetoe, UFM business manager.

The fire escape, now stairs leading from the third floor of the building to second floor with a ladder from the second floor to the ground, must be made into stairs all the way down. Illuminated exit signs must be installed, along with fire alarms and a smoke detection system.

"You can see remnants of the smoke detection system along the hall," Rippetoe said. The fire marshal has judged it as inadequate.

FIREDOORS OF fire-resistant construction will be installed at each level on the stairs. Fire resistant materials must also be used in high-risk areas, such as the furnace room, Rippetoe said.

The fire marshal also specified placed where halls should be widened. Rippetoe said rather than moving walls, they might be removed entirely and the areas used as wide-open office space.

UFM plans to use the second and third floors for office space with the main floor used for meeting rooms. Rippetoe said the main floor will stay basically the same in design, but the fireplace in the living room will be restored.

The basement will have a pottery room where Straube's kitchen was and a kitchen will be installed in another part of the basement.

UFM MAY also put an apartment in the building and will use the house director's apartment if they choose to have one, Rippetoe said.

FONE and the Drug Education Center, now housed at UFM, 615 Fairchild Terrace, will have offices in the wing of Straube.

The cost of renovation will determine whether or not UFM will ask the student government association for an increase in funding to pay rent, Rippetoe said.

UFM currently receives $4,750 per year for rent and the lease agreement for Straube includes rent of $5,000 per year.

A proposal to allocate the extra $250 for rent will be brought before the Student Senate by Terry Matlack, student body president, this fall. Matlack proposes to take the funds out of SGA's long-range account.

"I'm looking for SGA to help UFM out monetarily and morally with support of a student fund drive," Matlack said.

UFM HAS TAKEN out a loan for the cost of renovation and plans to pay back the loan with funds raised in a campus and community drive. The drive won't begin until after the United Way drive in the fall, Rippetoe said.

Energy-saving improvements, such as storm windows and more insulation, will be made, he said and UFM hopes to "ultimately use solar heating."

Structural improvements will be made during August. Electrical and construction items will be handled by professionals, Rippetoe said, while painting and plastering will be done by volunteers and UFM staff.

UFM hopes to move into Straube by Sept. 1.

"There'll be some wonderful problems for people to tackle," he said.

Carter discusses nuclear test ban talks; believes Israel set up 'obstacle to peace'

WASHINGTON (AP)—President Carter announced Thursday that the United States, Britain and the Soviet Union will begin preliminary talks on Oct. 3 aimed at completely banning all of their nuclear testing.

Carter also told a nationally broadcast news conference Thursday that he believes Israel's move to legalize settlements on former Arab lands in the West Bank area has set up "obstacles to peace." But he called them "obstacles which I think we can overcome."

Carter said he hoped the nuclear talks, to be held in Geneva, could lead to other nations also agreeing to ban all nuclear testing.

More than 100 countries, including the U.S., Soviet Union and Britain, already have agreed not to explode any nuclear device above ground, underwater or in outer space. The only nation currently exploding nuclear devices in the atmosphere is the People's Republic of China.

Treaties also have been reached between the U.S. and the Soviet Union limiting the explosive power of underground atomic tests and banning underground tests except for peaceful purposes. However, the Senate has not yet ratified these agreements and they are not officially in effect.

There is no ban or pending ban on underground testing for peaceful purposes. Both the U.S. and USSR have exploded numerous underground bombs in recent years.

During the 35-minute news conference, Carter had this to say on other topics:

"Accurate criticisms" of his domestic policies by blacks and others are fine. However, to the extent that director Vernon Jordan of the National Urban League alleged in a weekend blast "that neither I nor my administration nor the Congress was concerned about the poor, those statements were erroneous" and could rob the poor of hope for "a better life."

—The nation's projected annual trade deficit of $25 billion, a cause for concern in some quarters, is due wholly to oil imports and, in Carter's view, underscores the need for a national energy conservation program.

—Having interviewed six candidates to succeed Clarence Kelley as director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the President said he feels no pressure to act quickly and "we reserve the right to interview more in the future if we like."

—Carter favors new congressional charters to spell out the responsibilities of the FBI and the Central Intelligence Agency.

—During the first six months in office, he has "learned how to work much more harmoniously with the Congress" and has gained respect for the diligence and expertise of its members.

—Carter acknowledged making "minor mistakes" during the half-year and drew laughter by adding, "To be perfectly frank, I don't personally care to point them out."

—Despite planned fresh arms shipments to the Middle East, Carter remains committed to restraining arms sales and expects them to drop in the coming year. He suggested that many impending shipments reflect decisions made by former President Gerald Ford's administration.

Engine fire forces plane's evacuation

BOSTON (AP)—More than 200 persons abandoned a Los Angeles-bound American Airlines DC10 Thursday when a fire broke out in one of its engines as it started to take off at Logan International Airport.

Forty-five of the 192 passengers and 12 crew members were treated for injuries at Massachusetts General Hospital's Logan medical center. Officials said most of the injuries were minor—cuts, bruises and burns suffered sliding down the plane's emergency chutes.

"All of a sudden there was a 'boom' that shook the whole plane," said Edward Johnson, who added that this was to be the first plane ride for his wife, two children and himself.

When a stewardess said, "Everybody off the plane," that's the first time I really got scared," Johnson said. "I thought it was going to explode."

AIRLINE officials said there was no fire in the cabin itself.

Ron Brinn, a Massachusetts Port Authority spokesman, quoted firemen as saying flames could be seen shooting out a tail engine when they arrived, but he said the fire was doused within a minute.

John Yvon, 18, a passenger from Long Beach, Calif., said the evacuation took about two minutes.

According to airline and airport officials, this is what happened:

The wide-body jet with a 264-seat capacity had just begun taxiing for takeoff when a red warning light went on in the cockpit. The plane was moving at about 93 miles an hour.

The pilot activated the fire extinguishers built into the engines and brought the plane to a halt. All occupants slid down emergency chutes.

Due the heat, the abrupt ending of summer school and a lack of motivation among the Collegian staff, today's issue marks the final edition of the Summer 1977 Collegian.

Unless Manhattan is whisked away between now and late August, or unless an act of God makes it impractical to do so, the Collegian will resume publication on Aug. 29, the first day of fall classes.

Until then, the K-State community will have to struggle through the next four weeks without the benefits of this paper and without its daily crossword puzzle.

Have a good August.

Weather modification controversial

By EDMUNDEJEKAM
Collegian Reporter

Man has always exerted himself to understand and control things around him—the weather included.

Today weather modification is a subject which is surrounded by controversy. And participating in this controversy are diverse groups: farmers, scientists, lawyers and politicians.

The arguments for and against the practice are as many as the number of people doing the arguing. Its future remains cloudy.

Weather modification can be any of the following: hail suppression, lightning suppression, hurricane modification, snow pack augmentation and rain enhancement. Of these, rain enhancement remains the most controversial.

QUESTIONS have been asked; does it work, if it does is it significantly beneficial or does it do more harm than good?

According to "Can We Do Something About the Weather?" by Dean Bark, professor of physics, rain enhancement is done by "cloud seeding" when it is assumed a cloud does not contain enough nuclei to facilitate the natural process of rainfall.

"Early efforts used pellets of dry ice to chill the air and the surrounding supercooled droplets to the temperature at which freezing would occur," Bark wrote. "Today silver iodide is frequently used as a seeding agent."

SILVER iodide can be stored easily and can be distributed into the cloud as very fine particles with the aid of an airplane.

The nuclei created or added to by the operation then form ice crystals that continue to grow in size by attracting supercooled drops contained in the clouds. When the crystals are big enough they fall as rain. Their sizes have to be big enough to resist evaporation on the way down.

On the other hand, the operation may produce rapid freezing in the clouds. The energy released by this process may heat up the cloud, causing its further growth upward. Thus the cloud's ability to gather more water vapor and subsequently fall as rain is increased.

BARK wrote that a cloud seeding experiment in South Dakota yielded a rough estimate that seeding produced about a seven per cent increase in the intensity and frequency of rainfall. Data from 1972 to 1975 were used.

But according to "Science Digest," Wayne Decker, chairman of the atmospheric science department of the University of Missouri, Columbia, Mo., said even if weather modifiers can prove a 40 per cent increase in precipitation that still wouldn't be scientifically significant.

In Kansas a project titled, "Comprehensive Study of the Effects of Altering the Precipitation Pattern on the Economy and Environment of Kansas" is in progress.

THE PROJECT, sponsored by the Kansas Water Resources Board, is a data analysis type of study on what artificially increased rainfall, if possible, will do to the yields of wheat, sorghum, corn and soybean. This is a joint study by physicists, economists and agronomists.

"We are not doing a cloud seeding study but we are saying if cloud seeding can be effective, how much more crops can we get from the increased rain," said Richard Vanderlip, professor in agronomy.

According to Vanderlip, the study is being conducted through crop reporting districts in nine areas into which the entire state has been divided.

VANDERLIP said estimates that have been derived so far for wheat indicate that a two inch increase in rainfall will yield a maximum of three additional bushels in western Kansas, one bushel or less in central Kansas and no increased yield in eastern Kansas.

"In western Kansas there's usually a lack of moisture, so anytime you can increase rainfall there it will be beneficial," Vanderlip said.

"The study will continue for another year before we'll be able to make a reasonable assessment of all the results," he said.

Similar projects are also going on in North and South Dakota, Montana and Wyoming.

WHILE some farmers who grow corn may advocate the artificial increase of rainfall, the bean grower in the same area may not.

When the arguments of whether the influencing of the precipitation is both possible and beneficial have been settled, the question of timing would arise. Farmers in the same area might be growing different kinds of crops which require different amounts of rain.

Permits are required for any weather modification practice.

One of the strongest arguments between farmers is cloud seeding "rustles" clouds from one farming area to another.

Jerome Kirby, a Texas attorney, is quoted by Science Digest, "Of those laws that do deal with weather modification conflict, the underlying idea is the old concept that a land owner owns everything beneath his land to the center of the earth and everything above his land to the heavens."

Kirby said that although the idea the world is flat and is the center of the universe, on which the law is based, has been long proven wrong, the law persists.

Some environmentalists argue any tinkering done with the weather constitutes a disruption of the natural weather cycle which will prove detrimental to man in the long run.

UFM instructor says bee keeping not easy

Beekeeping is not an easy task, said Dell Gates, extension entomologist.

"Years ago, there were regular curriculum courses in bee keeping." There were as many as three courses offered, he said. The class he teaches for University for Man is a "scimpy version" of what had been offered, Gates said.

Gates said he keeps bees as a hobby.

"For the last ten years I've had three to four hives to maintain," he said.

ONE of the first things you don't do when keeping bees, is try to keep them without the special equipment needed.

"Anyone working with bees cannot afford not to have the special equipment," Gates said. The equipment includes a pair of coveralls, guantlet-style gloves and a bee veil.

"But this doesn't mean bee keepers don't get stung," he added.

Also, a beginner should make sure he has a source of nectar for his colony. Gates said he has talked people out of keeping bees because they don't have the resources available to enable the bees to produce honey.

EACH HIVE has a queen bee and workers.

"What one is attempting to do is to build-up a large amount of workers" to collect the nectar necessary to produce the honey, Gates said.

There is a yearly cycle in keeping bees.

"In June and early July, the bees gather nectar from sweet clover," he said. Later in the year, there are nectar producing plants such as golden rod, but the honey from this nectar is not fit to eat, Gates said.

THE UNFIT honey can be used as food for the bees during the winter.

"You must provide a situation where you have 60 pounds of honey to carry the bees through winter," he said.

Bees regulate their temperature by the amount of food they eat. The temperature is 70 degrees in the hive. In early spring the bees cluster together which increases the temperature to about 90 degrees. The queen bee then starts laying eggs.

There are variations between bees and times when they are easier to handle, Gates said.

"The conditions vary. You don't handle them during a rain storm or before a rain storm," he said. "They are extremely protective of the hive (at this time)."

Another caution a bee keeper should take is trying not to be stung or smash a bee while working with them. If this occurs, a smell is released. The other bees smell this and concentrate to that spot, Gates said.

To calm them, you can put out a puff of smoke or rub chlorophyll from leaves onto the spot. This disorients the bees, Gates said.

VALDEZ, Alaska—Technicians restarted the pumps on the trans-Alaska pipeline Thursday, hoping the first oil in the 800-mile pipeline would reach the terminal here without further delay.

The technicians started the pumps again after completing government-ordered repairs on 14 welds in the oil terminal at this ice-free port on Alaska's southern coast.

The pipeline was shut for about 12 hours while the repairs were made. It was the fifth delay in 38 days.

A spokesman for Alyeska Pipeline Service Co. said the leading edge of the oil should begin gushing into storage tanks about 12 hours after the pumps were started.

The pipeline has been plagued with explosions, a cracked section of pipe, power supply problems and faulty welds since the oil began moving five weeks ago.

TEL AVIV—The third bombing in Israel within 24 hours wounded 28 persons Thursday at a market in the Negev Desert city of Beersheba. Palestinian guerrillas claimed responsibility.

Beersheba was the fifth Israeli city in which a bombing has occurred since July 6. The explosions coincided with renewed controversy over Israeli settlements on the West Bank of the Jordan.

In Washington, President Carter said Thursday that Israel's legalization of three such settlements posed obstacles to peace.

TOPEKA—Gov. Robert Bennett exhorted his new special committee on nursing homes Thursday to put aside partisan differences and work for improvements in caring for the elderly.

Bennett addressed the first meeting of the eight-member body he named recently, and stressed that he had picked those representing opposite sides of what has become a very visible issue in Kansas.

The governor, who has said he purposely named both representatives of the nursing home industry and those critical of the industry, warned them that, "sensationalism, obstructionism and conflict only further the suffering by a segment of our population which richly deserves our compassion, not our callous disregard."

WASHINGTON—Despite bitter criticism from lawmakers about illegal mail openings, the Postal Service said Thursday it will continue to allow customs agents to open letters from abroad.

"You have completely abrogated your authority over the mail entrusted to you," an angry Rep. Theodore Weiss, D-N.Y., told postal officials at a House Government Operations subcommittee hearing. Other panel members echoed his sentiments.

Postal officials acknowledged that customs agents have violated laws and government procedures that allow them to open mail without a search warrant only when they suspect a letter contains illegal drugs or other contraband.

But they said turning over mail to the Customs Service would continue. "We have to expect the other agency to comply with the regulations," said Assistant General Counsel Charles Braun.

KANSAS CITY—The Kansas City Royals won their second consecutive 11-inning game last night, beating the Cleveland Indians by a score of 5-4. The Royals won an 11-inning game the night before by the same score.

It was the eighth home victory in a row for the Royals, who moved to three-and-a-half games behind western division leaders, the Chicago White Sox. The White Sox, idle last night, come to Kansas City today for a three-game series with the Royals.

Health food restaurant planned

Don and Eddi Stilling have owned a natural health food store for five years and recently decided the people of Manhattan are ready for a natural foods restaurant.

"The restaurant will be a place where customers can experience food and the menu will be versatile enough to please anyone, from a strict vegetarian to a Kansas beef lover," Eddi said.

Health food is a product that has no preservatives or artificial coloring, no bleaching or stripping of the product, and no chemical warfare has interfered with the production of the food, according to Eddi.

"The country is rapidly becoming more aware of natural and health foods. Forty per cent of the people in Manhattan know about natural or health foods and 20 to 30 per cent of them participate with it on some level," Eddi said.

"This type of restaurant has been tried before in Manhattan and did not work out, but we feel it was when the information about health foods was not well known or believed by many. We feel that our restaurant is coming out of a need by the public. We have had nothing but encouragement from the people we have talked to and feel Manhattan is ready not only for a new restaurant, but for a place that specializes in natural food," Eddi said.

Ft. Riley to receive special ticket rates

By RICK SEITZ
Collegian Reporter

Active duty personnel at Fort Riley will have an opportunity to get special rates on general admission tickets for three K-State football games this fall.

Bones Nay, assistant athletic director, said a general admission ticket at Fort Riley which regularly sells for $5 will be sold for $4 for the games against Florida State, Sept. 17; Mississippi State, Oct. 1 and Iowa State, Nov. 12. Tickets for all other games will be sold for $8.25 for the regular reserve seats. The tickets will be sold through the recreational services department office at Fort Riley.

"We are interested in providing some incentive for improved attendance from the military," Nay said. "We are providing an outlet for non-college people to get a chance to see some college football."

He said the main objective was to fill the stadium and, if some type of goodwill is created along the way that's all for the better.

To friend and foe; a fond farewell

Thankfully, no major disasters, natural or man-made, have occurred on campus this summer. All in all, things have been pretty quiet.

Many people have expressed concern about our editorials always taking a negative viewpoint. This has been true more often than not, but it is the purpose of an editorial to stimulate thought and to offer a different point of view on an issue.

This summer we have expounded upon international, national, state and local issues. The issues we chose are those which touch all of our lives, though they may be about events which are geographically far away.

THREE TIMES this summer we have written about the freedom of the press. Although many of you may be tired of this issue, we feel it is one of vital importance to all, not merely a torch carried by journalists.

Without a free press, we would lose all our freedoms, for freedom of the press leads to freedom of thought.

National issues, although they may not touch us directly now, are of concern to all of us. It is our responsibility to inform ourselves about issues, for ultimately they will influence our lives.

International issues are not irrelevant. The world is shrinking, we are all part of a global, interrelated community. So, if you've ever thought we've strayed too far away from home, take another look around you. No one is isolated.

We hope you have read the editorial page this summer. Whether you agree or disagree with what we have said doesn't matter. If you are reading, you are thinking.

We hope the rest of your summer will be good. Au revoir.

Plight of our skyscrapers

First it was the great elm, slowly succumbing to the awesome Dutch Elm disease. Next came the famous coconut palm in Florida, under a ruthless siege from a mysterious disease certain to eliminate that state's most famous landmarks.

Whatever is causing the near extinction of these American monuments, however, has spread from the living to the lifeless. According to an architect friend of mine, the newest victim under attack is the American Skyscraper (Tall Buildingus Uncle Samus).

"It's finally happening," Thorndike said. "We had an idea that, with all these trees getting sick, the disease would soon spread to buildings, but we didn't know it would happen so soon."

"What exactly is this disease?" I asked. "We don't know yet, right now we're calling it urban skyscraper rot," Thorndike said. "The symptoms are classic, a slow but steady decay of the outer skyscraper shell. The scary part is that we haven't been able to contain the disease and it's spreading like the plague."

"Surely something can be done to slow the problem down," I said. "Even the elms and coconut palms were treated to contain the disease."

"Right, but remember, those are living things, we're talking about a building without roots or leaves."

"We've got a solution that we inject into all of the water fountains, hoping it will circulate through the entire structure. Unfortunately, a lot of people have been drinking out of them and we've been getting some negative reactions to that kind of treatment."

THE SEVERITY of the problem suddenly hit me. "We could lose a lot of our skyscrapers couldn't we," I said, beginning to sweat and dreading what Thorndike had not yet said.

"It's beginning to look that way," Thorndike said. "Our estimates are that most of the buildings have about three years on the outside before they go the way of the Edsel, the Dodo and Nixon."

"Don't be redundant," I said, trying to make light of the disaster I knew was coming.

"Think of what a country without skyscrapers will do to us," he said. "No more crazy French tightrope walkers, no more lunatics climbing up the World Trade Center and what will the rest of the world think of us when Superman is seen leaping over a two-story duplex?"

"What can we do," I asked, my eyes quickly dampening.

"Well, we've taken about two-thirds of our buildings as a loss already," Thorndike said. Those we'll have to humanely immobilize by putting a few painless shots into their revolving doors.

"The rest we're thinking about moving to an unaffected area where there's no smog to infect them. We've been giving a lot of thought to establishing a skyscraper national park for our children, but you know what they say, you can take the building out of the city, but you can't take the city out of the building."

The last and final word

This being my last and final column this summer, I wish to clarify the notion that I do not have a sense of humor. Actually, I do, it's just that it hasn't surfaced during the past eight weeks. But this, being the final, 40th and last newspaper slaved over by the summer Collegian staff, brings out my somewhat dry, definitely twisted sense of humor.

To entertain all of you, this column will be nothing but complete and utter bull, trivia or whatever you want to call it.

The vast, huge, monumental problem I am facing now is what to write about which will adequately demonstrate my wit. For these past weeks, I have focused my columns on issues of the day and I hope, have prodded some of you into doing some thinking.

Having been so serious for so long, ideas which might be amusing to some of you seem a little beyond my grasp.

ACTUALLY, I did ask for advice about this column. Unbeknownst to most of you, there is a little man who runs around the newsroom whose advice is free for the asking. He is a clever little man. He is also very funny.

His name is Milo Yield.

"Milo," I asked, "What should I write about for my last and final column?"

"Well," he replied, "Since you don't have a sense of humor, why not write about having nothing to write about?"

"That's already been done," I replied.

"Well, why not leave the page blank?" he asked.

Now, that, I thought was an excellent idea. If the page was left blank, readers could write anything they wanted. But, a blank page would only mean the staff members were void of ideas, which would be a misrepresentation of their hard work and intelligent suggestions.

So, as you see, I decided to write about nothing.

Letter to the editor

Young's reply distressing

Editor,

I am troubled by the reported response of Vice President Paul Young to the charges made by two K-State students of mismanagement on the part of superintendent of grounds, Thomas Shackelford. According to the Collegian, Young said that an investigation might be authorized "should the students report their grievances against the operation of the grounds department to university development, or should the case receive enough publicity to warrant an investigation."

Although an administrator cannot be expected to investigate every grumble overheard, it seems to me that in this case the complaints are sufficiently detailed and specific, and of great enough significance to justify Young's taking some initiative to find out the truth of the matter — with or without a signed complaint (which obviously would jeopardize the complaining employee's advancement in the grounds department). I am not suggesting that a full-blown investigation by a specially appointed committee is necessary at this time. However, Mr. Young should meet with both Mr. Shackelford and the complaints immediately without waiting to see whether "enough" publicity develops. This attitude implies reluctance to assume supervisory responsibility.

One other point: Young's comments about the limited budget of the grounds department are irrelevant to the question of whether those resources are used productively.

Radio-controlled planes gain popularity

By STEVE CARTER
Collegian Reporter

The hobby of flying radio controlled (RC) airplanes has gained popularity in Manhattan the last two years.

Tom Wilkerson, owner of Tom's Hobby Shop, started a radio controlled airplane club, called the Riley County Fliers, in Manhattan two years ago. Since then the club has grown to about 40 members, ranging in age from 13 to 50 years old.

"I started flying RC airplanes because I was interested in airplanes and had seen other people flying the RC planes," said Brad Carter, a member of the club.

"I used to fly line control planes where you were confined to a circle. With the RC planes you aren't," said Jouke van Swaay, another club member.

"I used to go with Tom and I thought it would be fun," said Rosann Wilkerson, Tom Wilkerson's wife and only female club member.

"I like the freedom. RC planes can do most anything a real plane can do. The first takeoff and landing is really scary because you're afraid that you'll wreck the plane," Mrs. Wilkerson said.

"To fly a RC plane a person must have a FCC class C license. You fill out the application and the FCC sends you a license free," Wilkerson said.

ALMOST all members of the club belong to the Academy of Model Aeronautics (AMA) club, having a membership over 60,000.

The United States is divided into 11 AMA districts. Within the districts are local flying clubs.

The AMA holds sanctioned contests in the districts between different local flying clubs. There are three types of competition involved: scale, the model built closest to scale of the actual airplane; pattern, performing specific maneuvers; and pylon racing.

The winners in the contest are awarded points, determined by the number of people participating in the contest. Fliers with the required number of points are eligible for the international contest.

"We also have Fun Flies between club members in the surrounding areas. There are no points awarded because they are not AMA sanctioned contests. The winners get donations of plane kits, engines, and fuel," Wilkerson said.

THE FUEL is a mixture of nitro-methane and synthetic oils and sells for about $12 a gallon.

"The largest plane I ever built had a wing span of 10 and one-half feet, but the average wing span is six feet," Wilkerson said.

The cost for an airplane body, engine and radio starts at $175 said Wilkerson.

The club practices at the intersection of highways 177 and 24 on the northwest corner.

K-Staters in the news

JACOB MOSIER, professor and head of the Department of Surgery and Medicine, has been awarded The Commissioner's Special Citation for "invaluable contributions to the decision process involving the future use of low-level antibiotic drugs in animal feeds in the U.S.," by the Food and Drug Administration.

ALTA INSKEEP, payroll clerk in the Comptroller's Office, will be retiring Friday after 27 years of service.

Professors study effects of competition

Experiment utilizes TV pong game

By EUGENE PERKINS
Collegian Reporter

One of the main instruments in a psychology experiment being conducted this summer is—believe it or not—a TV pong game.

Mark Barnett and Karen Matthews, assistant professors of psychology and Charles Corbin, professor of health, physical education and recreation (HPER), are using the game to study how competition affects certain behaviors among children.

Barnett and Matthews are mainly concerned with how competition among children affects their helping and sharing behaviors.

"The greatest emphasis we place on competition in our society may have some negative effects on behavior," Barnett said. "It is my hypothesis that a kid who is highly competitive may focus on himself and not concern himself with others, while a highly cooperative child will be more concerned with helping others," he said.

CORBIN'S main interest in the experiment is finding whether placing children in competitive situations produces more anxiety than placing them in a cooperative situation.

"From the moment children start to learn a sport they are told they must beat someone else and this is likely to create some anxiety," Corbin said. "Several studies that have already been conducted indicate losing, as opposed to winning, creates anxiety."

"Maybe we'd be better off just letting kids learn skills on their own, rather than by competing with others. After this experiment, we hope to be able to combine its findings with the findings of other studies and come up with directions for teachers and coaches which state 'If you want your kids to be comfortable, do this,'" Corbin said.

The subjects for the experiment are children from the gymnastics and swimming classes being conducted in the Ahearn complex this summer. They range in age from seven to 14.

TWO CHILDREN of about the same age are randomly selected to participate in the experiment at a time. Each pair is taken to the HPER lab where they play the pong game.

Some pairs are told they are competing against each other. Other pairs are told they will be working with each other against the machine. With still other pairs, each child competes individually against the machine.

Each pair is then shown a videotape of two children competing or cooperating on the pong game. If two boys are participating in the experiment, the tape shows two boys. If two girls are participating, the tape shows two girls.

"The film gives the children an example of what they're expected to do," Barnett said.

AFTER they play the pong game three times, each child is told that for participating in the experiment he will receive 30 prize chips, which are redeemable for prizes.

The children are then separated and each one is shown a poster of a crippled child and a donation canister.

"At this time," Barnett said, "the experimenter says something like this: 'Other people who have been here have been willing to share their prize chips with less fortunate children. It's totally up to you, but if you want to donate all you have to do is drop your chips in the canister.'"

After the children donate, Corbin gives them a questionnaire designed to determine their anxiety level.

After a few more pairs of children participate, the experiment will be finished except for analyzing the results.

"I've gained a lot of insight as to how research is conducted," Werner said. "I was really impressed with the kids. I thought we might have a lot of brats, but they were very cooperative and helpful."

Varied loans, grants available to students

By LISA SANDMEYER
Collegian Reporter

All scholarships for the 1977-78 school year have been awarded and all work-study money has been allocated to students, but those in need of financial aid can find help through four other federal programs, a state loan program and a loan program offered by the K-State Alumni and Endowment Associations.

Through the Basic Educational Opportunity Grant Program (BEOG) a Kansas resident can receive up to $1,100 as an undergraduate. Out-of-state students are eligible for up to $1,400.

BEOG funds are available throughout the year and K-State receives about $2 million in federal funds, according to James Upham, associate director of the student financial assistance office. BEOG monies are appropriated by Congress and, if funds run out, Congress appropriates more, Upham said.

The Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant (SEOG) is available to students of "exceptional financial need who without the grant would be unable to continue their education." Students eligible for SEOG can receive up to $1,500 per academic year.

K-STATE receives about $330,000 for the college work-study program. In work-study, money is allocated to the student in need and funds are made available to his employer to pay the student. Upham said work-study funds make-up about one-sixth of the student payroll at K-State.

The federal government also appropriates funds to universities for the National Direct Student Loan (NDSL) program. K-State has over $1 million each year to loan to students in need. The University loans money to students that former students pay back.

NDSL allows undergraduate students to borrow up to $2,500 per academic year; graduate students may borrow up to $5,000. Repayment begins nine months after graduation with an interest rate of three per cent.

THROUGH the Guaranteed Student Loan Program, a student can borrow from a private lending institution and the loan will be guaranteed by a state or private nonprofit agency or insured by the federal government.

The Higher Education Assistance Foundation, new in Kansas, offers loans to students attending Kansas schools or Kansas residents attending schools in other states. To qualify for a loan from this organization, the student must have been turned down for a loan from commercial lenders.

GUARANTEED student loan repayment also begins nine months after completion of a degree. Both loan programs require a minimum yearly payment of $360.

Loans of up to $1,000 are available through the Alumni and Endowment Association. It is not necessary to prove financial need. Six per cent interest is charged.

Financial need is calculated by the ACT (American College Testing) financial need analysis and it is the only financial statement accepted by K-State.

All aid programs are based on need. Upham said money is allocated by starting with the student with the greatest need and "working up until the money runs out."

It takes about two months to process an application for aid and receive the money, Upham said.

When the ponies run; a sport of kings

It's Friday night. The temperatures are in the mid 90s. You've just entered what looks like the back of a football stadium. You approach a counter which resembles a check-out stand at your local grocery store. In a line are about 50 cash registers, their bells dinging.

Choosing one counter, you purchase a two dollar ticket to win. Now, you reach for a tip sheet, program and head for your seat.

Along with 500 to 1000 people, you are about to witness pari-mutuel horse racing.

Pari-mutuel horse racing originated many years ago when neighbors would pit each other's horses in a race and mutual wagers were placed on who would win.

Today, pari-mutuel horse racing is a multi-million dollar operation. Tracks for pari-mutuel racing are scattered all around the country.

At the tracks where betting is allowed, a percentage of the wager is deducted and fed back into track operations with a cut taken out for the state. Percentage cuts are determined by state law. The better is actually not wagering against the track, but against other betters.

NOW, with your ticket in hand for win, place or show, you are ready for the first race to begin.

The races you are about to witness are not between thoroughbred horses, but between quarter horses. A smaller horse than the thoroughbred, the quarter horse was originally bred for ranch work, such as moving cattle. They are known for their ability to run a quarter of a mile at an extremely fast pace.

Quarter horses don't race the mile and a half oval track that thoroughbreds run, rather they run a sort of drag race of 300, 330, 400 and 440 yard distances.

It is now post time. The horses are loaded into the starting gate awaiting the bell which signals the start of the race.

The bell rings and they're off. They thunder down the 400 yard stretch in about 20 seconds, barely enough time for the crowd to get on their feet.

Often, the race is a head-to-head battle to the finish line, and on many occasions the official placings are determined by a photograph, commonly known as a "photo-finish." Track officials say a photo-finish never lies.

Currently, pari-mutuel betting is illegal in Kansas, but Nebraska and Colorado host many racing events throughout the summer.

Horse racing, be it pari-mutuel or thoroughbred, has been called the "sport of kings" but you don't have to be a king to enjoy it.

TOP—Eight two-year-old quarter horses break from the starting gate at the ring of a bell. MIDDLE—Anxious spectators watch as the field of horses thunder towards them. ABOVE—A lone wagerer places her bets on the next race. BOT-TOP LEFT—With ticket in hand, the wait is on for the final results of the race. BOTTOM RIGHT—With one race over, track jockies wait to be called for the next race.
